2. See Juzjani vol. I, 1963: 405 (trans. vol. I, 1881: 489); Inaba 2013: 77–78 and passim; Allegranzi 2014: 100–101. See also Volume II.
3. Juzjani vol. I, 1963: 346, 353 (trans. vol. I, 1881: 357, 369–371).
4. Cf. Bosworth 1994: 398–399; O'Neal 2013: 58–59; Chapter 1, above.
5. Cf. Bosworth [1977] 1992: 124–126; Biran 2005: 48–52. The last author noted that the years of the Oghüz in Khurasan is "the middle period of Qara Khitai history (1144–77) … [and] certainly the least documented one," so that more is known of the conflicts between the Oghüz and the Saljuqs, whose unraveling permitted the nomads to roam unhindered in some areas, including Ghazna, until their routing by the Shansabanis.
6. Juzjani vol. I, 1963: 396 (trans. vol. I, 1881: 448–449).
7. As noted by Bosworth ([1977] 1992: 111–114), the eastern reaches of the Perso-Islamic world during the twelfth–thirteenth centuries, particularly the regions of Afghanistan and parts of Central Asia, received comparatively little attention in the surviving works of Arabic- and even Persian-language authors, the latter being "more concerned with such pressing questions as the break-up of the Great Seljuq empire … and the menaces from Central Asia of the Qara Khitai and the Khwarazm-shahs." Thus, Ibn al-Athir and Juzjani provide a rather skeletal chronology for the events leading to the Shansabani capture of Ghazna (AH 569/1173–1174 CE) and Gardiz (AH 570/1174–1175 CE), and the crowning of Shihab al-Din as Sultan Mu'izz al-Din at Ghazna. Cf. Juzjani vol. I, 1963: 357–358, 396 (trans. Vol. I, 1881: 376–377, 449); Bosworth [1977] 1992: 125; Edwards 2015: 96; O'Neal 2016a; Chapter 1.
8. The earlier scholarly summation of Mu'izz al-Din's status at Ghazna as one of "gilded vassalage" (Scerrato 1962: 265) has gradually shifted, so that Flood (2009a: 89ff.) defined "the apogee of Ghurid power" as an unusual arrangement of "the brothers rul[ing] in a condominium" (but cf. H. A. Khan [2016: 24] describing Mu'izz al-Din as "the second in command of the empire, who ruled in the name of his elder brother and regent"). As we have seen throughout this book, however, the centrifugal fragmentation of patrimony was a common and even usual tendency among many nomadic–pastoralist societies. Cf. also Introduction & infra in this chapter's concluding section.
9. See Bosworth [1963] 2015: 36; Planhol [2000] 2012. Ball (2020) noted that the Rutbils politically co-existed with the Kabul-based Turk-shahis, but their relationship is still to be clarified. See also Bombaci 1957: 248–250; Bombaci 1966: 4ff.; Lewis 1995: esp. 115ff.; Chapter 3.
10. E.g. Glatzer 1983; Glatzer and Casimir 1983; Barth 1961; Beck 1983; Garthwaite 1983.
11. Such was the case with the Basseri within the Khamseh confederacy, brought together by a charismatic and enterprising merchant ensuring safe caravan passage by allying five (Ar. khamsa) tribes under his aegis (cf. Barth 1961: 72, 86–90); and the late eighteenth-century Afsharid mobilization of various Turkic groups and their eventual confederation as the Qashqai to confront and negotiate later Qajar domination (Beck 1983: 287–289).
12. Cf. Garthwaite 1983: 314–321.
13. Cf. esp. O'Neal's (2020: 210–211) analysis of Mu'izz al-Din's silver coinage issued at Ghazna between AH 569 and 581 (1173–1185 CE), where he is named