

Figure 6.11 Congregational Mosque and Thamban Wari Masjid, Jam Jaskars Goth, Sindh, Pakistan, plans, elevations, drawings. After Kevran 1996: figs. 9–14.

These buildings in the localized traditions – some attributable to the Baluch and/or other nomadic pastoralists, and some to local saints and heroes – were not the only built forms marking the landscape. The larger projects patronized by elites in the region subscribed to distinct building practices. For example, only 7 km southwest of Banbhore–Dibul – and well within the circuit of the Ghazna Shansabani campaign of AH 578/1182 CE – lay Jam Jaskars Goth, one of the many large and small commercial centers, fortified warehouses, and waystations punctuating the shores of the Indus over time as it changed course toward the east.[40] This site's extensive remains included a quadrangular fort (7,900 m^2), a large congregational mosque (3,000 m^2), and a smaller but more complete mosque (about 1,300 m^2); altogether "these monuments [were] not those of a village, but rather