The present Appendix aims to contribute to this ongoing effort, particularly for the twelfth century in Afghanistan and Pakistan: here are all the known, deciphered, and discernible architectural inscriptions, conveying religious and/or historical content (e.g., Afghanistan IV: 2, 5–9). Moreover, discussions of these findings in the relevant chapters of this volume hopefully demonstrate the immense value of "purely" religious inscriptions, even when they did not accompany historical epigraphic content (cf. esp. Chapters 4 and 5).

It should be noted that, where inscriptions from periods other than that of Shansabānī ascendancy are relevant, they are generally cited and discussed in the notes (see, e.g., Pakistan III: 9). The one exception to this practice is the inclusion of some Ghaznavid-period epigraphy from Ghazna itself (cf. Afghanistan V and VI): the rationale guiding this decision has been that Shansabānī architectural patronage, both at this site and elsewhere in their territories, was undertaken in direct dialogue with the in situ monuments of their Ghaznavid predecessors. Since Shansabānī-patronized monuments were to some degree responding to those earlier architectural projects, the latter's epigraphic programs are provided here for reference.[4]

Finally, the inscriptions for each site and building have been arranged according to the anticipated movement around and through the built environment – essentially, a visitor's experience of it – and the hypothetical sequence of reading. Not only is it assumed that the Arabic–Persian inscriptions would be read from right to left, they also follow consecutively from exterior to interior spaces, and from the heights of elevations to their bases (top down). In some examples, such as the small tombs in the vicinity of Multan in the lower Indus region (Pakistan II and III), probable circumambulation would have directed a specific encounter of the epigraphy, so that the order of inscriptions follows what was likely clockwise progress around these structures.

Afghanistan

Balkh's Western Vicinity, Juzjan Province

I. Tomb of Sālār Khalīl[5]

Exterior, main entrance

1. Surrounding entrance frame, Kufic, Arabic: Bismillah, identification of structure as the tomb (مشهد) of Sālār Khalīl.
2. Horizontal inset above entrance, foliated and knotted Kufic: shahāda.