Notes

1. Arranged alphabetically and chronologically.
2. Hillenbrand 2012: 19ff.
3. Among the most relevant works for Iran and Central Asia is of course Blair's (1992) comprehensive collection of inscriptions from these regions. Additionally, R. Giunta's masterly work on the funerary inscriptions found at Ghazna (2003), along with the follow-up article of 2017, serve as important sources for the inscriptions in Volume II (cf. also Afghanistan V–VI infra).
4. See esp. Chapters 4 and 5. A particularly noteworthy example of Ghaznavid–Shansabānī imperial dialogue – or rather, the latter's emulation of their famous predecessors – comes from the Shansabānīs of Fīrūzkūh: their court poet Fakhr al-Dīn Mubārakshāh al-Marvarrūẓī (d. AH 602/1206 CE) – to be distinguished from the India-based poet known as Fakhr-i Mudābbir, a.k.a Mubārakshāh (fl. mid-thirteenth century) – apparently composed one of only two known pre-Mongol "dynastic *mathnavī*s," quite possibly using as his model the contents of the lengthy epigraphic program of the Ghazna palace's central court, which might have been the other surviving example of this poetic genre (see Afghanistan V). Fakhr al-Dīn's full composition is no longer extant, known only through subsequent quotations from it, e.g., in Jūzjānī's Ṭabaqāt (vol. I, 1963: 318–319; trans. vol. I, 1873: 300–302). Cf. Khan 1977: 127; and esp. Allegranzi 2019a, vol. I: 143–144 and n. 82.
5. Also known as "Bābā Khaṭīm ziyārat." Cf. Melikian-Chirvani 1968; Sourdel-Thomine 1971; Schneider 1984; and Introduction, above.
6. Sourdel-Thomine (1971: 315) characterized the Qur'anic references in this inscription as "formules pieuses," finding its remainder illegible. As later deciphered by Schneider (1984: 165), in fact the Qur'anic phrases appeared to form part of a prayer for the compassion of Allah upon the named calligrapher/decorator or builder.
7. The present volume's focus on the initial Shansabānī occupation of Bust–Lashkari Bazar (see Chapter 5) has necessitated the separate treatment of archaeological finds from sites: the well-known stelae recovered near Bust, from the tomb locally attributed to a certain Shāhzāda Shaikh Ḥusain ibn Shaikh Ibrāhīm, will be treated in Volume II. Nonetheless, see Sourdel-Thomine 1956; Crane 1979; and Introduction, for a discussion of the Shāhzāda Shaikh Ḥusain tomb.
8. See Sourdel-Thomine 1978: IB:65ff.; and especially Chapter 4.
9. Cf. Chapter 5 (including notes) for a discussion of the inscription's variable readings.
10. Cf. Blair 1985: 81–82; Kalus 2017: Fiche No. 37804; Ball 2019: No. 212. I reiterate my gratitude to Dr. Viola Allegranzi (2019b [forthcoming]) for sharing her work in progress on Chisht's epigraphy.
11. See Chapter 4 (esp. notes) for a discussion of the seemingly anachronistic presence of this laqab: As of AH 558/1163 CE Bahā' al-Dīn Sām's elder son had adopted Ghīyāth al-Dīn for his regnal title as sulṭān. See also Giunta and Bresc 2004: 227.
