30. See Y. Godard 1936: I:367–369 and II:351; Pinder-Wilson 2001: 162–166; Giunta and Bresc 2004: 177, 187, 193, 194, 198, 201.
31. After Sourdel-Thomine 2004; Giunta and Bresc 2004: 218, 225; Lintz 2013. See also Ball 2019: No. 468.
32. See full discussion of the minār's probable miḥrāb and orientation (qibla) in Chapter 4.
33. See esp. Sourdel-Thomine 1978: IB:11–15, 29–36, 42–50, 54–57 and planches; also Allegranzi 2020a. The specific locations referred to within this site are derived from Lashkari Bazar (1978) planches 2, 3, 4, 13, 23. Cf. also Ball 2019: No. 685. The sequence of inscriptions listed here has taken into account the probable dual principal axes of ingress into the palace: one from the south (via the eponymous bazaar preceding the palace itself), which would first bring the visitor to the forecourt's mosque (VIII:1), and then onto the main façade of the palace structure (VIII:2); and another, more ceremonial entrance on the palace's north perimeter from the Helmand's banks (VIII:3). The vastness of this site is well known, and to date its many structures (in varying states of preservation) have been only partially explored and documented. The focus here is on decipherable epigraphic remains dated either by content or style to Shansabānī presence; but several smaller architectural ruins besides those deemed palaces were also attributed to this period, based on anepigraphic motifs and their execution: e.g., Building Annex XX (northeast of South Palace), and the so-called House of Racquets (Residence XIII) about 1 km northeast of Bust. See Sourdel-Thomine, op. cit., 54–55, 60–61.
34. Although undated, Sourdel-Thomine (1978: IB:57) attributed the miḥrāb's epigraphic program to a second phase of intervention here, namely, Shansabānī renovations at the site overall (see also VIII:2–4), based on the "refinement of certain forms of letters … that would be difficult to imagine before the epigraphic development of the second half of the twelfth century in Afghanistan" (my trans.).
35. Sourdel-Thomine (1978: IB:35–36) was in favor of a late Ghaznavid date for parts of Audience Hall I's epigraphic program, likening the execution to works such as the *minār*s of Mas'ūd III and Bahrām Shāh (cf. Afghanistan VI). Even without Shansabānī renovations here, however, the ceremonial and architectural predominance of this audience hall would have surely required Mu'īzz al-Dīn's engagement with it after his victorious occupation of Lashkari Bazar and its environs. See also Chapter 5.
36. Cf. Khan 1988: 307–377; Edwards 1990: 182–193; Edwards 1991: 92; Edwards 2015: 111–127, 201–210. The exterior of this structure is strikingly devoid of ornament or epigraphy, at least partially due to renovations over the centuries. Cf. Chapter 6.
37. See Khan 1988: 316–322; Ali 1993: 134–136; Flood 2001.
38. From Rehman and Hussain 2011.
39. Reproduced side-by-side with a line reading of the text in Rehman and Hussain (2011: 69–70). Further examples of bilingual Śāradā–Persian or –Arabic inscriptions have been published: cf. Dani et al., 1964; Rahman 1998; and Chapter 6 notes.