(Appendix, Afghanistan I: 3–5) were not unusual in the overall corpus of Islamic architectural inscriptions: e.g., Qur'an III: 18–19 (Al 'Imran) was also part of epigraphic programs at Chisht and Ghazna, and throughout the eastern Islamic lands since at least the eleventh century (cf. Blair 1992: 9, 52, 56, 137, 153); meanwhile, the famous Throne verse (II: 255–256) was also present since at least the early eleventh century at Tirmiz (Blair 1992: 101), and at Chisht and Lashkari Bazar. Cf. also Chapters 4 and 5, and Appendix, Afghanistan III: 5, VIII: 4.

55. Blair (1985: 84) took up the application of dynastic appellations to art-architectural styles in her analysis of the Zuzan madrasa (AH 615/1218 CE), patronized by the local malik in the service of the Khwarazm-shah 'Ala' al-Din Muhammad Takish (r. AH 596–617/1200–1220 CE).
56. Even during the 1970s prior to the Soviet invasion of 1979 (and for scholars based within Afghanistan itself – e.g., N. Dupree 1977), Powell's photographs were regularly utilized both in popular guidebooks and more scholarly works as among the most thorough and meticulously documented archives of the more remote areas of the country. Powell's work was incredibly prescient, making possible the continuing research on this global region into the present day.
