Shansabanis' sard-sir royal encampment (cf. Chapters 3–5). Thence, the last Ghaznavid sultan was dispatched to imprisonment and eventual death in Gharjistan.[85]

Notes

1. Cf., e.g., Tapper 1997: 32–33. Fredrik Barth's (1961) pioneering fieldwork among the Basseri of southern Iran during the mid-twentieth century actually revealed a polyglot milieu of Persian- and Turkish-speaking tribes, though his data collection relied on oral reports of remembered pasts. These reports were at times contradictory – e.g., regarding the tribe's hoary origins (Barth 1961: 52) – but surprisingly consistent about recent history and the formation of alliances and confederacies (Barth, 72ff., 86ff.). The Basseri's tendencies were to be contrasted to the Shahsevan, whose "different versions of origins … reflected … differing constructions of their identity" (Tapper 1997: 317). On the linguistic diversity among certain nomadic pastoralists in Iran and Afghanistan, cf. Tapper 1983: 11–12. See also Khazeni (2009) on the Bakhtyari of Iran, specifically the work known as Tarikh-i Bakhtyari (1910–1911), "a sweeping combination … [of] oral histories and geographical lore"; and Chapter 4.
2. See, e.g., Paul 2018b: 325–326 for the Oghüz nomads in Balkh and their intersections with the Saljuq presence there, and the historical authors' views of "Khurasani history of this period in terms of a sedentary–nomad dichotomy, a perspective that continues to inform modern scholarly literature." Admittedly, the data of textual sources – additionally narrowed by their focus on reigns, courts, and dynasties – can be supplemented with epigraphy and numismatics. Nevertheless, mobile populations remain largely unrecoverable even in this expanded catchment of information.
3. For the Saljuqs, see Peacock 2010: 53ff.; Peacock 2015: esp.13; Durand-Guédy 2013a, 2013b. Thomas (2018: 21–23ff.) also discussed the varying degrees of erasure from the historical record of nomadic populations, often dismissed as unruly and otherwise undesirable social elements – a theme running through the works of the early Arabic geographers and into modern historical studies. Cf. also Rao 1982 (mentioned infra); Thomas and Gascoigne 2016: 171ff.
4. Cf. Bosworth 1961.
5. See Baihaqi (trans. Bosworth) 2011, vol. I: 195, 198–207. Also Bosworth 1961: 126 and n. 22; Bosworth [1963] 2015: 118, 121, 227; Bosworth 1968a: 35; Bosworth 1973: 121; Bosworth [1977] 1992: 68–69; Mahmud 2009: 59–60; Inaba 2013: 78; O'Neal 2016a; Allegranzi 2019a, vol. I: 45; Rasikh 2019: ch. 2. Juzjani, vol. I, 1963: 329 (trans. 1881, vol. I: 319–320) briefly mentioned raids into Ghur also during the time of Sultan Mahmud's father, the trusted Samanid ghulam and military leader Sabuktigin (d. AH 389/999 CE), when the latter had received the region from Tukharistan to Zamindawar as a reward for his loyal service to his Samanid overlords. Cf. also Chapter 3 (notes).
6. Detailed in Deloche, vol. I 1980/1993: 29–32 and maps II and III; see also