distances between mainstream Persianate trends and the largely isolated populations inhabiting the hinterlands of even renowned urban centers such as Ghazna – further exacerbated in the case of Ghur: Juzjani's erudition must have had to concede to his patrons' decidedly provincial perceptions.

19. See Juzjani, vol. I, 1963: 320 (trans. vol. I, 1881: 301ff.). Cf. also Meisami's (1993) study of the process by which pre-Islamic Iranian mythology and specifically Islamic sources together provided origins during the eleventh century.
20. See esp. Volume II for the texts patronized at the north Indian courts, which have little to offer on the early Shansabanis in Afghanistan. Kumar (2007: 21–22, 92, 297) addressed this issue, though more specifically regarding northern India's Persian literary culture during the early thirteenth century, which tended to be "Delhi-centered" and "wedded to the history of a unitary state formation." Even Uchh Sharif, the contemporaneous locus of political power and cultural capital, and the site of Nasir al-Din Qabacha's court in upper Sindh, patronized its own cohort of scholars and poets and witnessed the circulation of these literati – most notably Juzjani himself – between the two rival cities. See Alam 2003: 138–141.
21. Due to the confusion introduced by E. Denison Ross (1922), it bears reiteration that this personage must be distinguished from Fakhr al-Din Muhammad ibn Mansur Mubarak-shah al-Quraishi ('urf Fakhr-i Mudabbir), a Persian litterateur who began his career at Ghazna under the later Ghaznavids. The latter's decline and eastward retreat prompted the writer's own emigration to Lahore and eventually Delhi. No doubt in part due to overlapping professions, careers, and lifespans (and, no doubt, names), Fakhr-i Mudabbir was initially confused with the genealogy's author Fakhr al-Din Mubarak-shah. Cf. Juzjani vol. I, 1963: 318–319 (trans. vol. I, 1881: 301–302). Also Khan 1977; Siddiqui 2010: 17–18; Bosworth 2012a; Auer 2012: 22–23; Auer 2018: 96 and n. 5.
22. Juzjani, vol. I, 1963: 318–320ff. (trans. vol. I, 1881: 300–302ff.)
23. See esp. O'Neal 2016a; O'Neal 2015; O'Neal 2020; Cribb 2020. I am grateful to both authors for sharing advance copies of their forthcoming publications.
24. Cf. Rasikh 2019: ch. 3. The various genres of Persian prose and poetry in India largely derived from the broader Persianate world of the time (Kumar 2007: 366; Alam 2003). The political and cultural specificities of the Indian location nonetheless filtered into even the universal history or tarikh tradition, to which Juzjani's Tabaqat belonged. Despite Tabaqat's multifaceted representation of events (cf. Siddiqui 2010: 93ff.), Kumar (2007: 367) distinguishes the work as an atypical tarikh, highlighting its grouping of people according to "social affinity" – in itself perhaps a subtle but firm erasure of the Shansabanis' "lowly" non-sedentist origins.
25. Cf. Hodgson (esp. vol. II, 1977: 293–94) for the coining and explication of the term. For a recent engagement with the concept, see esp. Green (2019: esp. 7), who undertook its transtemporal and spatial interrogation, proclaiming "the need to analytically denaturalize Persian's [as a language] civilizational ties to Islam and denationalize its primordialist ties to Iran."
26. As symptomatic of the current scholarly status quo, Spooner (2019: 305)