327–331; Smith 1939; Y. Godard 1936: 363–364; Miles 1939: 11–14; Bloom 1989: 160.

40. Cf. Introduction. Despite Sourdel-Thomine's own reservations, she generally leaned toward such dynastic appellations, both for the Saljuqs and the "Ghurids" (cf. Sourdel-Thomine 1953; Sourdel-Thomine 1960: esp. 277). However, the author did clarify early on that, for the Saljuqs "the term did not suppose a strictly dynastic remit, but designated … all the constructions erected at the time when Saljuq power played a primary role in the Islamic lands" (1953: 109 n. 3) – a useful clarification since, as we see in the main text, Saljuq-affiliated elites and other personnel were robust and visible patrons. See also Hillenbrand 1994: 152. The architectural culture under discussion has also been described as the "wider architectural koine" specifically in reference to Qarakhanid-patronized buildings (McClary 2020: 108).
41. Peacock 2015: 248.
42. See Godard 1949: 10–11, 31, 54 and passim; and Kalus, TEI: Nos. 34503, 34495, 34499, 34491, 34493, 34497, 37426, 40834, 34501; Peacock 2015: 107–109.
43. Cf. Bosworth 1994: 381–386; Peacock 2015: 35–36, 41–42; Paul 2018b; see also infra in this chapter.
44. Sourdel-Thomine 1953: esp. 122–129.
45. See Tate 1910/12: facing 22, 26–27; esp. O'Kane 1984: 89–97; Bosworth 1994: 395–396.
46. Meisami 1999: 20ff.; Green 2019: 12–13, 16; Spooner 2019: 310ff.
47. By contrast, the Saljuqs "vaunted their [Turk] origins through their alien Turkish names, and introduced new political symbols and practices that originated on the steppe" (Peacock 2015: 3). This difference might be explicated at least in part through the differing historical origins of the two ruling groups: The Ghaznavid progenitors' and early sultans' memories and knowledge of their natal world, the Eurasian steppe, would be at best faint, given their steeping in the Perso-Islamic prestige culture of the Samanid court; by contrast, the un-enslaved and free Saljuqs' active infiltration into the Persianate world allowed less compromised memory and cultural pride to travel westward with them.
48. See esp. Bosworth 1968a: 36ff.; Bosworth 1973: 61; Peacock 2015: 3. See also Chapter 3 (notes) for Sabuktigin's enduring loyalty to the Samanids.
49. For fascinating "hybrid" iconographies combining Buddhist and Brahmanical elements at Tapa Sardar near Ghazna, see Taddei 1968; Taddei and Verardi 1978; Verardi and Paparatti 2005. The proximity of the Buddhist–Brahmanical site to the east of the great capital of Ghazna led scholars to consider the potential interaction between the later residents of Ghazna and the abandoned pre-Islamic ruins: Tapa Sardar could have been the Shahbahar or Shahrabad of Ghaznavid sources, mentioned by Baihaqi and Gardizi, and in the poetry of Farrukhi and Ansari: located a farsakh from Ghazna in the plain, troops were reviewed here before their departure on ghazwa to India. Cf. also Bosworth [1977] 1992: 56. Linguistically, Shahbahar or "the king's temple" [?] makes reference to the Buddhist vihara, often incorporated into Arabic toponymic suffixes as bahar. Cf. Taddei 1968: 109–110; Melikian-Chirvani 1974: 8–10; Allegranzi 2014: 109–110; Errington 2017: 44. According to a more