Asia based succession on the agnatic line, and tended to regard the single household or tent as the basic socio-economic unit, rather than a "joint-family ideal" where males "pool their labor and animals under the direction of their father." Thus, property would be fractionally divided upon a patriarch's death, effectively constituting a system of "anticipatory inheritance" (Barth 1961: 19–20). It has additionally been observed that, while these groups might claim to adhere to Qur'anic stipulations of property division, the realities of agnatic inheritance generally excluded females; only in cases of agnate conflict would religious authorities be invoked, who tended to be more exacting about Qur'anic adherences while adjudicating disputes (cf. Barfield 1993: 101). Another prominent historical example of nomadic anticipatory inheritance was the division of existing and future conquests between Saljuq ibn Duqaq's grandsons Tughril and Chaghri in the early eleventh century CE (Peacock 2016: 6).

58. Although the exact political hierarchy of the Sistan Maliks vis-à-vis the Shansabanis is not clear, Bosworth's view of Sistan overall was that the region was caught up in the larger politico-military developments in Khurasan, being subject to the Ghaznavids and the Saljuqs throughout the eleventh and mid-twelfth centuries, eventually ending up as Shansabani vassals upon accession of Sultan Ghiyath al-Din to the throne of Firuzkuh (AH 558/1163 CE). They, like the Shansabanis, succumbed to the Khwarazm-shahs by c. AH 612/1215 CE. See Juzjani vol. I, 1963: 395–396 (trans. vol. I, 1881: 447–448); Bosworth 1994: 398–399; O'Neal 2013: 58–59.
59. The one documented example of this external interference resulted from Mahmud Ghaznavi's punitive campaign to Ahangaran in Ghur in AH 401/1011, to discipline the Ghuris' caravan raiding: according to Juzjani (vol. I, 1963: 329–330 (trans. vol. I, 1881: 320–329), the sultan removed Muhammad ibn Suri and his older son Shish in favor of the more pliant and younger son Abu 'Ali.
60. O'Neal 2016a.
61. Cf. Juzjani vol. I, 1963: 335, 385 (trans. vol. I, 1881: 338–339; ibid., 422); Edwards 2015: 94. Saif al-Din Suri's designation as distributor of patrimony was itself indicative of the cultural preference for sons of lawful wives – presumably women of commensurate ancestry – as technically he was only 'Izz al-Din's third son. Among the seven male children (no mention being made of females in this generation), the eldest Fakhr al-Din was born to "a Turki servant," while the second Qutb al-Din also to "a woman … of no high name … the doorkeeper and servant of the mother of the other sultans …" Such hints seem to indicate that a melding of the Shahsabanis' (and likely other Ghuris') customary laws of inheritance with the more orthodox Islamic laws pertaining to dispensation of patrimony had not yet taken place. See also Chapter 3. The Shansabanis may never have come to follow strict Islamic orthodoxy in patrimonial inheritance: upon Ghiyath al-Din's death at Herat in AH 599/1203 CE, Mu'izz al-Din, now the eldest male, also proceeded to distribute appanages to his own male agnates, as his uncle Saif al-Din had done more than a half-century earlier. Cf. Juzjani, 1963 vol. I: 335, 385 (trans. vol. I, 1881: 471–472). Thus, even after the Shansabanis' public espousal and