patronage of Sunni orthodoxy (the Shafi'i madhhab at Firuzkuh and Herat, the Hanifi at Ghazna; cf. Chapter 4) age-old customary inheritance laws apparently remained in place.

62. Cf. Cribb 2020: 122, esp. for a discussion of the location of Parwan/Farwan; and O'Neal 2020: 202–204, 209–210.
63. Cf. Juzjani vol. I, 1963: 335 (trans. vol. I, 1881: 371–372 and passim, 424–425); also O'Neal 2020: 201, 207.
64. Cf. also O'Neal 2020: esp. 210.
65. Juzjani vol. I, 1963: 338 (trans. vol. I, 1881: 343).
66. Cf. Juzjani vol. I, 1963: 337, 338, 393–395 (trans. vol. I, 1881: 340–343, 439–445); Bosworth [1977] 1992: 113–115. See also infra in main text; and Chapter 4.
67. Cf. Juzjani vol. I, 1963: 341–342 (trans. vol. I, 1881: 350–351). Bahram Shah's expectation that his threat of elephants would suddenly make 'Ala' al-Din capitulate had appeared cryptic until recently: the elephant's diabolical associations within Islam had to be reconciled with their increasing numbers in the Ghaznavid arsenal, where they became invaluable destructive and tactical weapons. Mahmud had attempted to distract from his reliance on elephants by very propagandistically raiding and destroying India's "infidel" idol temples during the latter part of his reign. Cf. Anooshahr 2018b. However, it is possible that a century later, Bahram Shah still thought the threat of elephants would frighten his less worldly foe (prior to the Shansabanis' own campaigns to India; cf. Volume II), or perhaps he assumed the elephant's diabolic associations lingered among the Shansabanis in light of their more recent and thus lesser Islamization, accompanied by an incomplete literacy in Islamicate culture.
68. According to additional numismatic evidence, 'Ala' al-Din's son and successor Saif al-Din (r. AH 556–558/1161–1163 CE) also successfully occupied the city in AH 557/1162 CE, at least for a short period before his death (see Chapter 4). Cf. O'Neal 2016a; O'Neal 2020: 199–200.
69. Cf. Juzjani vol. I, 1963: 346–348 (trans. vol. I, 1881: 357–361); Leshnik 1968: 39; Bosworth [1977] 1992: 118–119; O'Neal 2016a. For the Saljuqs' nomadic military power, see Peacock 2015: 50, 143, 168, 224. See also infra in main text.
70. Another notable "conquest" during the reign of 'Ala' al-Din Husain was that of Gharjistan, which was apparently effected through a marital alliance: 'Ala' al-Din married Hurr Malika, the daughter of the reigning shar (not unlike the hereditary title of the Shah of Bamiyan; cf. Chapters 3 and 4), who was nonetheless only "one of the Maliks of Gharjistan." See Juzjani vol. I, 1963: 349 (trans. vol. I, 1881: 363). It was only during the reign of his famous nephew Shams al-Din ibn Sam (eventually Sultan Ghiyath al-Din, r. 1163–1203), however, that the magnificent madrasa of Shah-i Mashhad was constructed in Gharjistan (Chapter 4).
71. See Juzjani vol. I, 1963: 343–344 (trans. vol. I, 1881: 353–356); Bosworth [1977] 1992: 117–118; also O'Neal 2016a. Despite Juzjani's description of 'Ala' al-Din Husain's destruction of Ghazna and Bust-Lashkari Bazar as reaching legendary proportions, it has been archaeologically ascertained that these sites were still salvageable in the 1170s, even after the decade-long Oghüz encampments