at Ghazna in the 1160s. A little more than twenty years later the newly crowned Sultan Mu'izz al-Din went on to add his own mark to Ghazna and Lashkari Bazar, with architectural patronage consisting of palace renovations and other works. Cf. Chapter 5.

72. Cf. Bosworth [1977] 1992: 124–125; O'Neal 2016a.
73. O'Neal (2016a) has pointed out that the precise moment of the younger Shansabani's adoption of the regnal laqab is not clear: not only is there numismatic evidence for continued usage of "Shihab al-Din," but this laqab was frequently used to refer to the younger Shansabani in north Indian Sanskrit inscriptions (cf. Prasad 1990: 4, 8, 12, 28, 30). By contrast, "Mu'izz al-Din" was used in the Perso-Arabic inscriptions on the Qutb mosque – esp. the northern entrance – and on the first story of the Qutb minar (Horovitz 1911–1912: 14–18). See Volume II.
74. Cf. Juzjani vol. I, 1963: 357–358, 396 (trans. vol. I, 1881: 377–379, 449).
75. Cf. Barthold 1968: 237–238, 329–330, 338–339; Bosworth [1963] 2015: 98–102; Kumar 2007: 77–79; Peacock 2015: 217ff.
76. As described by Fakhr-i Mudabbir (in Ross 1922: 397ff.), a qadi named Fakhr al-Din Kufi purchased Aibeg at the market of Nishapur, where the flow of Turk slaves was even more active than in Ghazna's market. Aibeg thereafter passed into the Mu'izz al-Din's possession. It is all the more surprising, then, that there is no known Shansabani coinage minted at Nishapur (cf. infra in main text).
77. Cf. O'Neal 2016a; and O'Neal 2015; O'Neal 2020. Despite the last Shansabani ruler's burial at the Sheikh Bayazid complex at Bistam, at present it is unascertainable whether the tomb structure was actually constructed by or for him. Cf. also Adle 2015: 242–243; and Volume II.
78. See Juzjani vol. I, 1963: 397 (trans. vol. I, 1881: 451). Juzjani's mention of Multan-Uchh as midway points from Ghazna would point to eastward passage into the Indus regions via the Gomal Pass – cf. Deloche (trans. Walker) vol. I, 1993: 26–27. However, for at least a century since the Ghaznavids' eastward campaigns, and well into the thirteenth century, the favored route between Ghazna and the middle through upper Indus areas appears to have been via Kurraman – a major mint site for the Ghazna Shansabanis' *jital*s. Cf. Tye and Tye 1995: Nos. 138, 174–178; and esp. O'Neal 2015.
79. While Juzjani (vol. I, 1963: 397 (trans. vol. I, 1881: 451)) named Bhimadeva – i.e., Bhimadeva II, r. 1178–1241/2 – as the triumphant foe, the reign of his predecessor Mularaja II (r. 1176–1178) also overlapped with the date of the Shansabani campaign. In the corpus of Chaulukya copper-plate inscriptions, the imperial genealogies (Skt. vamsavali) of at least three major land grants credited Mularaja with the defeat of the *garjjanaka*s or mlecchas (among the many labels for the northwestern invaders in Indian inscriptions and other sources, as summarized for the eighth through early seventeenth centuries by Chattopadhyaya 1998: 92–97). See Patel 2004: 5–6 and notes; and Volume II. While it is quite possible, then, that Mularaja II in fact led the Chaulukya forces repelling this first Shansabani campaign far beyond the Indus, Juzjani's substitution of Mularaja's successor Bhimadeva (II) in his recounting of the episode was not only an easy confusion – one's reign ended and the other's