began apparently in the very year of Mu'izz al-Din's incursion – it also heightened a historical parallel: Mahmud's oft-cited Somnath campaign of AH 416/1025 CE confronted the Ghaznavid sultan with the Chaulukya maharajadhiraja Bhimadeva I (r. c. 1022–1064 CE). Cf. Bühler 1877: 186, 213; Trivedi 1994: 165. As further discussed in Volume II, during this defensive campaign against the Shansabanis the Chaulukya forces were militarily aided by their Nadol Chahamana feudatories. Cf. Kielhorn 1907–1908: 72; Bhandarkar 1911–1912: 71–72.

80. Although the archaeologists who initially excavated at Banbhore remained circumspect regarding its identification as Dibul (e.g., F. Khan 1963: 50), the site is now viewed to be that of the pre-eminent Indus port center (A. Khan 2003: 2). Cf. also O'Neal 2013: 64–65; and infra in this chapter.
81. Juzjani vol. I, 1963: 397 (trans. vol. I, 1881: 452).
82. Cf. esp. Deloche (trans. Walker) vol. I, 1993: 30–34.
83. The strategy of obtaining command of a fort near a targeted stronghold, and placing a loyal deputy there awaiting further orders – in this case, Husain ibn Kharmil – very much echoed the later Shansabani inroads into the heart of the Chahamana territories: In AH 588/1192–1193 CE, a garrison under the command of the ghulam Qutb al-Din Aibek was stationed at the fort of Kuhram, in the vicinity of Mirath and within striking distance of Delhi, and ultimately the Chahamana capital of Ajmer (Ajayameru). See Juzjani vol. I, 1963: 397–398, 401 (trans. vol. I, 1881: 453–454, 469–470); Edwards 2015: 96–97, 111; and Volume II.
84. There is continuing confusion between two ethnonyms, viz. Gakkhaŕ (گکھر) and Kukhar (کوکھر), possibly perpetuated by copyists' orthographical errors over the centuries. Juzjani's mention of the last Ghaznavid sultan's mercenary allies as the Kukhar may have actually referred to the Gakkhaŕ. A tribal group with the latter name has been documented in West Panjab and southern Kashmir, characterized as a "war-like Muslim tribe … of indigenous origin … [and] agriculturalists by profession." The retention of some non-Islamic practices – e.g., prohibition of widow remarriage – may indicate a gradual, perhaps selective conversion to Islam not unlike that of the Ghuri tribes of Afghanistan, among whom some non-Islamic practices likewise persisted (cf. Chapters 2 and 3). The Gakkhaŕ "homeland" fell within the areas of Ghaznavid control during the late twelfth century, though whether the tribe was consistently agriculturalist during the last millennium remains unknown. Cf. Juzjani vol. I, 1963: e.g., 398 (trans. vol. I, 1881: e.g., 455); Rahman 1979: 31–32; Ansari 2012; Hanifi 2012; O'Neal 2013: 65 and n. 40.
85. Juzjani vol. I, 1963: 398 (trans. vol. I, 1881: 456–457) See also Bosworth [1977] 1992: 129–131 for a more detailed account, supplemented with the reports of historical authors in addition to Juzjani.