put a brave face on his performance both in public and in his reports to the Kremlin, in which he wrote: “We ridiculed the maneuver that Stevenson had made at the session in showing the photographs which had been fabricated by American intelligence and assigned the role of ‘irrefutable’ evidence of the presence in Cuba of nuclear-missile arms.” Like Dobrynin in Washington, Zorin in New York was kept in the dark by his government regarding the deployment of missiles in Cuba. Otherwise he would probably have behaved differently on the day when his boss in the Kremlin decided to give up the Soviet missiles in Cuba—missiles that, according to Zorin, had never been delivered to the island.[22]
