Logevall and Mary Sarotte for their encouragement. Sarah Chalfant and her team made me feel welcome at the Wylie Agency and helped me find an excellent home for the book: W. W. Norton & Company has published more on the Cuban missile crisis and the key figures involved in it than any other publishing house in the world. At Norton, I am grateful to John Glusman, Helen Thomaides, and Nancy Green for their guidance, support, and very useful though nonintrusive editing of the text.

I would also like to thank my students at Harvard who have taken my courses “The History of the Cold War” and “Cold War Summits” over the last few years. Many of their questions led to the answers that I provide on the pages of this book. At my home institution at Harvard, the Ukrainian Research Institute, I would like to thank the executive director, Tymish Holowinsky, and my colleagues on the institute’s “ExCom,” Tim Colton, George Grabowicz, Michael Flier, and Terry Martin, for their support of my academic endeavors. My chairing of our little ExCom provided me with some valuable insights into how the ExCom of 1962 may actually have worked.

Like all my previous books, this one would have been impossible to research and write without the unwavering support of my wife, Olena, for which I am profoundly grateful.
