numerous interactions in India, in particular with Praveen Swami who continued to provide valuable insights regarding Lashkar’s contributions to Indian jihadism throughout the drafting of this manuscript.

Two colleagues in London provided help with secondary sources. Jerry Moss, a veteran officer with the Metropolitan Police Service, is a trove of information regarding various activities associated with Pakistan-based militant groups in the United Kingdom. He gave freely of his time, helping to point me in the right direction for open source information on Lashkar’s Europe-based activities. Dina Esfandiary at the International Institute of Strategic Studies kindly translated French materials regarding some of the group’s Francebased operatives.

This book benefited from a number of reviewers who offered comments at various stages of the drafting process. Rudy Chaudhuri, Polly Nayak, Peter Neumann and Saleem Vaillancourt offered helpful advice on sections of the manuscript. Sumit Ganguly and Frédéric Grare both provided useful guidance after reading an early draft. Alexander Evans, Arif Jamal, Myra MacDonald and Praveen Swami reviewed later drafts. By positing alternative analyses or proffering new facts all of them helped me to navigate the story of Lashkar’s evolution. I could not have asked for a better publisher or editor than Michael Dwyer at Hurst who took great care in editing my manuscript. Thanks to Columbia University Press as well for agreeing to co-publish the book and to the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, which hosted me for the final stages of writing.

To friends and family who patiently accepted my absence from events big and small, thank you for your support and understanding. I owe a particular debt to three people. First, to my mother and father. Throughout my life they encouraged me to expand my world, even if it meant missed time with them. Wherever I have gone in life, they were always there to support me. Second, to my wife Stephanie whose time I stole to write this book. Wherever I am in the world, she is home to me.