Lashkar's political and social welfare wing. Despite playing essentially the same role, JuD constructed a more independent identity for itself. Much of this had to do with the fact that Hafiz Saeed, who had always been the public face of Lashkar, was ostensibly disconnected from it after 2002. Whenever he appeared in public or spoke to the press, which was quite often, it was as the leader of JuD. At many of these appearances Saeed connected JuD—sometimes tacitly and often overtly—to Lashkar's jihad against India as well as calling for jihad against the US and Israel at times.

President Musharraf formally proscribed Lashkar and Jaish on 12 January during a nationally televised address.[76] He pledged that Pakistan would not allow its territory to be used for any terrorist activity anywhere in the world, but used language that failed to include Pakistan-administered Kashmir, which had never been incorporated into the country and technically retained its own government. Musharraf also promised that henceforth his country would back only indigenous Kashmiri militant groups, which he stated must purge all non-Kashmiri members.[77] Recall that, only weeks earlier, JuD claimed—falsely—that Lashkar-e-Taiba had been handed over to the Kashmiris and its infrastructure moved to Pakistan-controlled Kashmir. During his speech, Musharraf also promised that no organization would be allowed to call itself Lashkar, Jaish or Sipah in Pakistan any longer. Technically, he was correct. Within a month, the ISI was quietly encouraging many of the banned groups to reconstitute themselves under new names.[78] Lashkar-e-Taiba became Pasban-e-Ahl-e-Hadith (also technically separate from the above-ground JuD), Jaish-e-Mohammad renamed itself Khuddam-ul-Islam and a JeM splinter faction emerged under the name Jamaat-ul-Furqan. Sipah-e-Sahaba Pakistan officially became Millat-e-Islamiyah Pakistan and Harkat-ul-Mujahideen changed its name to Jamiat ul-Ansar. All of these groups continued to operate and are generally still referred to by their original names, a practice this book follows.

Despite his ostensible separation from Lashkar, Pakistani police detained Saeed on 30 December, having done the same with JeM amir Maulana Azhar five days earlier. Pakistani authorities claimed both men were detained for making inflammatory speeches to incite people to violate law and order, though the actions clearly had been meant to mollify India.[79] Saeed was released in late March, when the Lahore High Court denied an
