A Full-Service Provider

The group's medical mission was greatly expanded and by the middle of the decade had more than 140 dispensaries discharging medical care for a nominal fee; six hospitals; and sixty-six ambulances.[41] According to the Amir of JuD for Rawalpindi, whose job it was to oversee all of the group's operations in that area, by 2009 it had the second largest ambulance fleet in the country.[42] The group also held hundreds of medical camps from 2003 onwards, and claimed to have served over 30,000 by 2006.[43] JuD also started a 'Self Supporting Program' that provided widows who had no income with items like a sewing machine and unemployed or uneducated men with those such as a bicycle so they could earn money on their own. It developed religious-specific programs as well, including the 'Taiba Qurbani [Sacrificial] Program' that collected donated animals for destitute families to sacrifice on Eid al-Adha and an 'Arrangement for Breaking Fasts Program' that arranged food for people to break fast during the month of Ramadan.[44]

The organization's Social Welfare Department was renamed the Humanitarian Relief Department, or Idarah Khidmat-e-Khalq [IKK], and introduced a host of new service offerings, including an 'Emergency Aid Program,' which provided resettlement and relief aid to the victims of natural disasters; a 'Water Provision Program' to dig water wells and provide hand pumps where clean drinking water was not available; and a 'Refugees Rehabilitation Program' in Pakistan-administered Kashmir. The latter proffered food and other essential items on a monthly basis to Kashmiri refugees who fled across the LoC.[45] According to one former senior officer in the Intelligence Bureau this program also provided Lashkar with a good cover to carry out recruiting activities.[46] IKK also worked internationally, providing relief aid following a major earthquake in the Iranian city of Bam in 2003 and sending 20 million rupees worth of relief goods to Sri Lanka when the Asian tsunami hit that country in December 2004. Amir Hamza, one of the group's founders, also traveled to the Maldives to distribute money among the victims there.[47] Separately from its relief work, JuD claims to have provided clothes to over 75,000 people across the provinces of Pakistan as well as to approximately 2,000 others in Sri Lanka, the Maldives and Indonesia through its 'Dress Provision
