Program.'[48] Once again, this altruism also brought operational benefits: the Maldives was one of a number of nodes in the networks the group used to support terrorist operations against India.[49]

The Al-Dawa System of Schools expanded and by the latter part of the decade boasted over 170 educational institutions at which approximately 20,000 students were receiving an education annually. It also began offering two different educational tracks: a 'Sharia Based Education Program' and a 'Modern Education in Accordance with Islamic Values Program.' The former provided Islamic education only, though the aim was to 'produce religious scholars—rather than just imams—who can provide ideological leadership to the nation.' The latter taught the same 'c' is for cannon and 'g' is for gun curriculum as during the 1990s. By this point JuD had published close to fifty books for use in its schools, and developed a teacher training course that covered its curriculum.[50] The group continued to charge for its schools (though it also continued to subsidize students in need) and for its propaganda offerings, as well as raising large sums of money by selling the donated hides from animals sacrificed during Eid al-Adha. All of this was in addition to its investments in subsidiary organizations, agricultural land and other businesses.[51]

Lashkar, along with some other groups, still received cash from the ISI, but funding could be frozen and there is anecdotal evidence to suggest this happened at times.[52] Most of the other jihadi outfits suffered financially, since the state's crackdown made their efforts to raise money from private donors in Pakistan and abroad more difficult.[53] The fact that JuD remained legal meant it could continue to fundraise openly, and it did so aggressively. The group still asked for people's sons for jihad, but it increasingly said 'If you want to save the Islamic umma then give us money.'[54] This is not to suggest Lashkar ceased recruiting, but rather that at the time there was a strong enough recruitment stream to satisfy its militant demands. As the group expanded its social services offerings many people who never previously gave money to finance the jihad began donating to the group to support its welfare activities.[55] Because JuD was a legal entity in Pakistan, its bank accounts also remained secure. As late as 2008, the group was directing domestic and international donors to deposit money into a JuD account.[56] As already mentioned, it was not until the UN Security Council
