recruits as well as an escalation of external support from Lashkar as well as other actors. Even after indigenous elements came together to form the Indian Mujahideen, that terrorist network remained part of a larger jihadi project. Sabauddin's experience was also atypical since fidayeen assaults constituted the exception rather than the rule in terms of Lashkar's involvement in terrorist attacks against India. These were intermittent and high profile operations, in contrast to the consistent drumbeat of bombing attacks designed to bleed India. They were also relatively small-scale affairs; the Akshardham Temple and Bangalore operations each involved only two fidayeen. This made the Mumbai attacks in 2008, executed by a ten-man attack squad, all the more striking. So too did the inclusion of Western and Jewish targets, since many continued to view Lashkar as a purely India-centric outfit. Yet in reality the group began participating in the jihad against America and its allies almost immediately after 9/11. It is to these activities that we now turn.

Bad Jihadi

Lashkar was wary of associating too closely with al-Qaeda after 9/11, lest this draw the unwelcome attention of the United States or upset its Pakistani sponsors. Al-Qaeda operatives, in turn, were wary of working too closely with the group because it remained close to the ISI. They sometimes suspected unfamiliar Lashkar foot soldiers of being ISI agents or informants.[117] Nevertheless, several Pakistan-based Western diplomats and one senior officer in the Pakistan security services confirmed reports that senior leaders within the organization were involved in al-Qaeda led meetings with the Taliban and other jihadi organizations after 9/11.[118] Lashkar's contributions to the jihad against America and its allies during the 2001–2005 time period primarily entailed the provision of facilitation, training and support to other actors, though on several occasions the group or elements within it undertook direct actions to kill Westerners. For organizational purposes it is helpful to develop a rough typology of Lashkar's activities in the global jihad against America and its allies. These are divided into the following categories: the provision of safe haven and protection for other jihadi outfits; participation in the open fronts in Iraq and Afghanistan; the provision of training to non-Lashkar recruits and the facilitation of access to al-Qaeda's networks and training camps; and
