Pakistan.'[180] He aimed to use Toronto for this purpose.[181] Ahmed and Sadequee went there from Atlanta, Georgia for a week in March 2005 to meet with others from the online network. At least one of them was part of the 'Toronto 18,' a group of fourteen adults and four youths arrested in 2006 by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police on suspicion of plotting to attack the Parliament Buildings in Ottawa and detonate truck bombs in Toronto.[182]

During the meeting in Toronto, Ahmed and Sadequee not only discussed training in Pakistan, but also identified possible targets for a terrorist attack in the US.[183] A month later the duo traveled to Washington, DC, where they shot video recordings of possible targets, including the US Capitol, the headquarters building of the World Bank, the Masonic Temple in Alexandria, Virginia and a group of large fuel storage tanks near a highway in northern Virginia.[184] Sadequee then sent those video clips to Khan as well as to Younis Tsouli, a British man known online as Irhabi 007 [Terrorist 007] who acted as a propagandist for al-Qaeda in Iraq [AQI].[185] While Ahmed and Sadequee were clearly ready to contribute to terrorist attacks in the US, Ahmed was also open to fighting alongside Lashkar in Indian-administered Kashmir or elsewhere if directed to do so by the group. On 17 July 2005 he traveled to Pakistan, intending to study in a madrasa and then train with Lashkar.[186] While there he met with Aabid Khan in an attempt to actualize his ambition of training with Lashkar, but failed to gain entrance to the group's camps and returned to Atlanta in late August 2005. Sadequee also left the US in mid-July and traveled to Bangladesh, where he began working more closely with Tsouli and Bektasevic, the Serbian militant arrested in Bosnia-Herzegovina, to launch what he hoped would be a European affiliate of al-Qaeda. Both Ahmed and Sadequee were later arrested by US authorities and convicted on multiple counts, including the provision of material support to Lashkar.[187]

The threat from homegrown terrorists radicalized in Western countries and trained in Pakistan was brought into stark relief on 7 July 2005 when four young British men blew themselves up on three London underground trains and a bus. The 7/7 attacks, as they are commonly known, killed fifty-two civilians and injured hundreds more. They occurred ten days before Syed Haris Ahmed arrived in Pakistan hoping to train with Lashkar, and may have contributed to his difficulty accessing the group's camps.
