On 22 September 2003 France's domestic intelligence agency, the Direction de la Surveillance du Territoire [DST], sent a cable to Australia's national security service, known as the Australian Security Intelligence Organization [ASIO]. The subject was Willie Brigitte, who, as mentioned earlier, began training with Lashkar soon after 9/11.

French authorities had been searching for him under an alias for almost a year by September 2003, and after determining he had left France on a one-way ticket to Australia sent the initial cable to confirm his presence there. Less than two weeks later the DST sent a second cable to the ASIO. It was not intended simply to confirm Brigitte's location; instead, it said, 'Brigitte is possibly dangerous.'[209] Australian Federal Police arrested Brigitte not long after the second cable arrived. ASIO had been granted coercive powers to detain and interrogate suspects several months before Brigitte's arrest, but Australian investigators knew far less about him than their French counterparts. After eight days in detention, Brigitte was sent back to France where the law was far harsher toward suspected terrorists.[210] When DST notified the Australians it was based on the belief that he was involved in a plot to attack targets in Australia, a suspicion that subsequent interrogations of Brigitte in France and investigations in Australia confirmed. Like Rama, El Cheguer and Mokhfi, Brigitte was convicted in France of participation in an association of criminals with a view toward the preparation of an act of terrorism. However, unlike them, the authorities were able to bring evidence of his involvement in a terrorist plot. This, coupled with the fact that he trained in Pakistan with Lashkar, figured in his conviction.[211]

Brigitte was dispatched by his Lashkar handler to assist Faheem Khalid Lodhi, an Australia-based operative of Pakistani descent, with launching attacks there. After the French alerted ASIO, the Australian security services put Brigitte under surveillance, which in turn led them to Lodhi who was arrested and later convicted of planning to blow up the Sydney electricity grid.[212] Lodhi was born in Australia and emigrated to Pakistan in 1999, where he trained with Lashkar before returning home. He again traveled to Pakistan in late 2001 and linked up with the group.[213] Other trainees there at the time have testified that Lodhi appeared to have a middle management role.[214] He returned to Sydney in 2002 and maintained
