of those who made this journey might have done so to retrieve weapons or explosives for use against targets in India's heartland.

In addition to using Indian-administered Kashmir as a staging or transit point, or simply hunkering down and contenting themselves with low-level operations there, Lashkar also increased its non-violent activities. The group sought to 'rebuild the foundation of Kashmir' by providing money for the construction of mosques and dispensaries. As in Pakistan, one aim was to make its interpretation of the Ahl-e-Hadith faith acceptable to the people. To this end, Lashkar began steering more money and manpower toward non-militant activities in order to do it.[35] This included providing funding for some NGOs and members of Kashmiri civil society in the hopes they would act as its public face in the region. These people did not proclaim their support for Lashkar, but indirectly worked to influence the environment in its favor. One Indian analyst asserted that this included attempting to stoke grassroots protests and political violence.[36] However, because protests were, and remain, a response to poor governance and the Indian security forces' heavy-handedness, it is questionable whether Lashkar's agitation was necessary or counted for much. Further, despite local frustration with the status quo and anger at many aspects of Indian rule, the populace remained largely unenthused about both Lashkar's interpretation of Islam and its desire to regenerate the conflict.

Indian jihadis were more enthusiastic, and Lashkar continued to assist the indigenous terrorist movement it had helped to build. The Musharraf regime, which made a real effort to curtail the Kashmir jihad, never dismantled the infrastructure on its soil used to execute and support terrorist attacks against India. On 7 July 2006, militants bombed seven commuter trains running on Mumbai's suburban railway. The explosions occurred over the course of approximately ten minutes and killed more than 200 people. Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh stated he was 'certain that the terrorist modules responsible for the Mumbai blasts are instigated from across the border.'[37] Lashkar is suspected of recruiting some of the operatives responsible for the 2006 strikes, facilitating their transit into Pakistan for training and providing some of the financing.[38] Abdur Rehman Syed, the army Major who joined Lashkar in 2003 and had his own unit in Karachi, claimed to know the Indian militants responsible for the blasts.[39] Lashkar is believed to have directed its Indian affiliates to execute the
