coordinate an exchange of information between India and Pakistan on terrorist threats. Although the foreign ministries, rather than intelligence agencies, led this effort it was still doomed to fail operationally because lack of trust between the two countries made real intelligence sharing almost impossible. However, its true intention does not appear to have been operational according to interlocutors close to the respective security establishments in India and Pakistan. Rather, the move was intended to show progress on the problem of Pakistani support for terrorism against India and thus enable a resumption of dialogue, which it did.

One Indian analyst asserted that, following the 2006 attacks, Lashkar worked hard to put a firewall between its own operations and those of its Indian affiliates.[44] By this time the Indian Mujahideen was a potent force, even if it was to be another year before the movement began claiming attacks using that moniker. However, it was also a fluid network in which, despite increased coordination, cells often operated clandestinely from one another. Nor was every jihadi cell connected to the Indian Mujahideen—other outfits existed and operated independently.[45] What many of these actors shared was continued access to external support, of which Lashkar remained the primary provider. The case of Ali Abdul Aziz al-Hooti is useful for understanding how extensive Lashkar's transnational support for Indian militancy was by this point. The child of an Indian mother, al-Hooti was radicalized during visits to his home near Mumbai where he heard about atrocities visited upon Indian Muslims. Al-Hooti is alleged to have trained twice with Lashkar by the time he had turned thirty, and became one of its top organizers in the Gulf and a key interface with the Indian Mujahideen. He transited money and weapons into India and helped to send dozens of recruits to Pakistan from his base of operations in Muscat, the capital of Oman.

However, Al-Hooti's recruitment efforts were not limited to the Gulf. He is believed to have recruited operatives from across the Indian Ocean, and his efforts reached all the way to the Maldives.[46] Some of the funding he supplied is believed to have enabled Lashkar to establish networks used to transit weapons into India by sea. These networks were employed in an unsuccessful attempt at a seaborne infiltration of eight Lashkar fidayeen into Mumbai in 2007. According to the Omani authorities, al-Hooti also considered launching operations within the Sultanate itself. In June 2007,
