STORMING THE WORLD STAGE

Ten men were part of the fidayeen squad that attacked Mumbai in November 2008. Mohammed Ajmal Amir Kasab was the only one to survive. Born in 1987 in Faridkot, Pakistan, Kasab dropped out of school thirteen years later to work as a laborer in his hometown. Within a year he left for Lahore, where he again worked as laborer for nearly five years. After quarreling with his father, Kasab struck out on his own. He landed a job in Jhelum city, north of Lahore. Unhappy with his meager income, Kasab quit in November 2007 and moved to Rawalpindi with a colleague named Muzaffar. A month later Kasab came upon Lashkar members collecting animal hides in the name of Jamaat-ul-Dawa during Eid al-Adha. He and Muzaffar obtained Lashkar's office address and showed up declaring their desire to wage violent jihad. After giving their names, addresses and other details they were told to return the following morning with extra clothes, whereupon the two received 200 rupees for the bus trip to 'a place called Marqas Taiyyaaba, Muridke' where 'LeT is having their training camp.' Upon arrival there the two were promptly enrolled in Lashkar's Daura-e-Suffa training. They were among approximately thirty recruits who took part in the twenty-one day training between December 2007 and January 2008. During the Daura-e-Suffa all of those who were not already adherents to Ahl-e-Hadith Islam converted.[1]

In February the recruits moved on to the Daura-e-Aama, which took place in the hills of Mansehra. This training also lasted for three weeks and consisted of running, climbing and weapons instruction. Like many trainees before him, Kasab then had to do khidmat, the performance of supervised service at a Lashkar office or camp.[2] After three months of service, Kasab enrolled in the Daura-e-Khasa at the beginning of summer 2008.
