traveled, along with the remaining recruits, to Lashkar's office in Okara district's Model Town and then on to the Bait-ul-Mujahideen outside of Muzaffarabad. The camp where they trained was located in the mountains, and once the recruits arrived they were not allowed to leave without their trainers' permission. The Daura-e-Khasa consisted of advanced weapons training as well as further religious indoctrination. The physical element was strenuous, and ten recruits deserted during the two-and-a-half month long training program.[3]

Kasab and the remaining recruits then returned to Muridke for additional classroom instruction, after which they traveled to Karachi for maritime training.[4] They lodged in a house in Azizabad, where Pakistani investigators later found a treasure trove of evidence at the house, which they documented in a dossier delivered to Indian authorities the summer after the Mumbai attacks. Evidence included 'militant literature, two inflatable life boats, different maps including [a] detailed map of [the] Indian coastline, hand-written literature on navigational training, [and a] manual of [an] intelligence course meant for operation[s].'[5] Indian and Pakistani dossiers on the Mumbai investigations state that Lashkar made use of a total of four houses and two training camps in Karachi while preparing for the attacks.[6] From Azizabad the recruits traveled to the coast and then out to sea where they learned to navigate using maps and GPS devices. After completing this initial maritime training they returned to the Bait-ul-Mujahideen near Muzaffarabad, at which point six of the remaining thirteen men were deployed to Indian-administered Kashmir.[7] Three new members were added to the group a day later, and soon after the tenman squad was told they would be attacking Mumbai. They were divided into five two-person teams, with each team assigned a target: the Chhatrapati Shivaji Terminus [CST]; the Leopold Restaurant and Café; the Taj Mahal Hotel; the Trident-Oberoi Hotel; and a Chabad House [previously known as Nariman House].[8]

All of the men studied maps as well as photographs and video footage of their targets. Lashkar handlers also equipped the recruits with cover identities. The men were given false identification cards with Hindu names, showing them to be students at Indian colleges. Following his arrest police found Kasab to be in the possession of an identification card showing him as a student at Arunodaya Degree College in Hyderabad.[9] Kasab said
