The ten fidayeen boarded the fishing trawler. Four members of the Kuber's crew were transferred to the Al-Husseini and killed not long after. Amar Singh Solanki, the Kuber's captain, was kept on board to help guide the attackers the remaining 550 nautical miles to the Indian coast.[15] The terrorists also made use of their GPS, which was programmed with the coordinates from Karachi to Mumbai, and kept in contact with their handlers in Pakistan via the satellite phone given to Khan.[16] According to a log the attackers kept, the trawler reached a point 4 nautical miles off Mumbai's coast at approximately 16:00 hours on 26 November.[17] They waited until nightfall and then slit Captain Solanki's throat.[18] The fidayeen then abandoned the MV Kuber for an inflatable dingy. While they were in the process of doing so, another boat came close to theirs'. Believing it was the Indian navy, all of the men jumped quickly into the dingy. Crucially for investigators, they left the satellite phone behind and forgot to open the sea valve, which would have scuttled the Kuber and with it much of the evidence eventually used to prove Lashkar's involvement.[19] Once on board the dingy, the attackers traveled to Badhwar Park Jetty, where they had been instructed to dock. On the night of 26 November they moored in Mumbai.

After alighting the ten men broke into five pre-arranged teams, one of which pushed back out to sea for the short journey by boat to the Trident-Oberoi Hotel at Nariman point. The other four teams split up and took taxis to different locations. Two of the teams planted IEDs, timed to explode later in the evening, inside their taxis. Another three IEDs were planted at locations along the routes taken from Badhwar Park to various targets. These too were timed to explode later in the evening, but either failed to detonate or were rendered inoperative by the Indian bomb squad.[20] Causing multiple explosions at various locations was intended to create confusion and give the impression of a larger strike force.[21]

Mohammed Ajmal Amir Kasab [a.k.a. Abu Mujahid] from Faridkot and Ismail Khan [a.k.a. Abu Ismail] from Dera Ismail Khan traveled to the Chhatrapati Shivaji Terminus, headquarters of India's Central Railways. The two removed their weapons from the bags they carried, began firing indiscriminately and lobbing grenades. When Kasab was later asked by police at the hospital who he was meant to kill, he replied, 'Whoever was there.'[22] One boy who survived the carnage said that when a Muslim man
