began praying out loud the gunmen promptly shot him down.[23] The two terrorists rampaged relatively unchallenged for almost ninety minutes. A police officer present at the time has since stated that he and his poorly-armed colleagues initially hid for cover. When three of them decided to challenge the gunmen, they did so with only one bolt-action rifle and one pistol among them. Several were gunned down and the killing continued until better-armed police arrived.[24] By the time Kasab and Khan fled the railway station they had murdered fifty-two people and wounded more than 100, making this team responsible for approximately one third of the total deaths during the close to sixty hour siege of Mumbai.[25]

The two men fled the terminus as additional police arrived, rather than holding their ground and fighting to the death. They looked for a taxi or car to commandeer outside the CST, but under fire from police arriving on the scene instead made their way to the Cama & Albless Hospital for woman and children. Finding many of the rooms locked, they abandoned the hospital. Meanwhile more police were speeding to the scene. Among them was Anti-Terrorism Squad chief Hemant Karkare and two other senior commanders. They had four additional policemen with them. The commanders had made repeated calls for backup, but it never came and the seven men drove to the hospital alone hoping to cut off the terrorists' escape. As they neared the hospital, their vehicle suddenly came under heavy fire from the two fidayeen. None of the seven escaped the fusillade of bullets. Kasab and Khan pulled the three wounded commanders from the front, and drove off with the four wounded or dead policemen still in the rear. Karkare and his two colleagues lay dying near the hospital—200 yards from police headquarters. All three were dead by the time additional police reached the scene.[26] Following another vehicle-born gunfight, the fidayeen hijacked a civilian vehicle, but soon confronted a police barricade where Khan was killed in an exchange of gunfire. A wounded Kasab pretended to surrender, before pulling out his rifle and killing another policeman. Several other officers overpowered Kasab and beat him unconscious.

Not long after Kasab and Khan commenced their killing spree at the Chhatrapati Shivaji Terminus, Shoaib [a.k.a. Abu Shoheb] from Sialkot and Nazir Ahmad [a.k.a. Abu Umer] from Faisalabad walked into the Leopold Café and Bar. It is one of Mumbai's best-known bars, and a popular hangout for foreigners. The two-man team confirmed with the staff that
