Capturing Kasab alive was another breakthrough, and it enabled Indian authorities quickly to build a compelling case. A video filmed by Indian police shows him lying on a hospital trolley on the first night of the attacks, confessing to his membership of Lashkar and to the group's responsibility for the attacks.[63] In addition to identifying the operational masterminds, Kasab provided an in depth description of how the team prepared for the attacks and the instructions they were given. Kasab later retracted his confession, only to reaffirm it unsolicited and in more detail before a magistrate.[64] Rama Vijay Sawant Vagule, the magistrate to whom Kasab confessed, testified that he volunteered his confession and was given several days to reconsider before doing so.[65] Kasab also offered a verbal confession in open court, speaking for several hours about his training with Lashkar and role in the attacks. The media published parts of this verbal confession, which were strikingly similar in detail to the account Kasab gave to the magistrate.[66] He later retracted these confessions too, but in May 2010 the court in Mumbai found him guilty on all charges, sentencing him to death on multiple counts and awarding life in prison on several more.[67]

The government of Pakistan initially denied that Lashkar or any other Pakistani played a role in the attacks, despite the mounting evidence. This position became particularly tenuous when a journalist in Pakistan broke the story within weeks of the attacks that proved Kasab was from Faridkot. The report also alleged that the security services had spirited away his parents from their village and were feeding misinformation to reporters looking for evidence of his origins.[68] Despite this report and subsequent new stories reconfirming Kasab's identity, Pakistani officials continued to stonewall.[69] In early January, India handed over to Pakistan the first of numerous dossiers containing evidence of the involvement of Pakistanis. The dossier included information on interrogations, weapons and data gleaned from satellite phones used by the suspects. India said the material proved Pakistan-based militants had plotted and executed the attacks.[70] Pakistani Interior Minister Rehman Malik admitted that part of the planning occurred in Pakistan. He also confirmed Kasab was a Pakistani national, but initially declined to confirm the identities of the other nine terrorists. Malik announced Pakistan was seeking additional information from India and said all the accused who were in Pakistan would be tried there, rather
