section refers to him as David Headley. Headley was the child of a Pakistani father and an American mother. His father raised him in Pakistan, where he was enrolled in the Hasan Abdal Cadet College. It is an elite military boarding school, many of whose graduates become high-ranking officers in the army. His mother withdrew David from Hasan Abdal in 1977 when he was seventeen and brought him back to the US where she was living.[80] In adulthood he became a heroin addict and some-time drug smuggler. He was arrested in 1988 for smuggling heroin from Pakistan, cooperated with authorities and received a four-year sentence while his co-defendant got ten. The US Drug Enforcement Agency [DEA] arrested him again in 1997 and he was convicted for conspiracy to import and possess heroin with the intent to distribute it.[81] After his second arrest in 1997 he began working as an informant for the DEA, and according to a 1998 letter sent by prosecutors recommending a lenient sentence 'helped the DEA infiltrate the very close-knit Pakistani narcotics dealing community in New York.' He also 'traveled to Pakistan…to develop intelligence on Pakistani heroin traffickers.'[82] Headley received an early release from prison and was allowed to travel to Pakistan in 1999 for an arranged marriage while still on probation. His probation also ended ahead of schedule; intended to last through 2004, a court agreed to discharge him in December 2001.[83]

When in Pakistan he sometimes visited the mosque at Jamiat al-Qadsia, Lashkar's headquarters in Lahore, to offer prayers. During one trip he saw a Lashkar poster soliciting money for the jihad against India and phoned a number given for the group's office in Model Town, Lahore. Two people came to his home to collect money and asked him to attend a lecture Hafiz Saeed was giving. He agreed and met Saeed for the first time. The two met again several weeks later at an Ijtema at Muridke. In 2001 Headley 'firmly decided' to join Lashkar and in February 2002, two months after his probation ended early, he attended the three-week Daura-e-Suffa at Muridke. In August 2002 he participated in the Daura-e-Aama in Muzaffarabad and then the Daura-e-Khasa in April 2003. Headley expressed his desire to Lakhvi to join the Kashmir jihad, but was told he was too old. Instead, he was directed to the Daura-e-Ribat, which focuses on surveillance, counter-intelligence and recruitment and is primarily intended for members who will operate in India. In December 2003 he spent another four months learning un-armed combat and close-quarter battle techniques in a course taught by a non-commissioned officer from