the Pakistan army.[84] In 2004, he was assigned to the wing responsible for Lashkar's Indian operations. It was at this point that he met Sajid Mir, who Headley knew as Sajid Majid and to whom he began reporting in January 2005. Headley made an ideal cover operative, thanks to his US passport and fluency in English, and it was decided he would work in India, though at this stage what he would do or where he would go had not yet been determined. Upon learning of his general assignment, he suggested changing his name and using a friend's immigration business as a cover for his activities in India. In September 2005 he returned to the US to put this process in motion.[85] On 15 February 2006 in Philadelphia, Daood Gilani became David Coleman Headley, though his confederates in Pakistan continued to know him by his given name.[86]

Through at least 2003, and possibly as late as 2005, Headley remained a DEA informant, according to one US official familiar with his case.[87] In August 2005 the Joint Terrorism Task Force [JTTF], a multi-agency unit led by the FBI, received a tip from one of his wives [he had a total of three, none of whom appears to have known about the others, as well as one ex-wife] that her husband was involved with Lashkar. His wife reportedly phoned in the tip following an altercation the previous day and she later met with several investigators, providing information about her husband's affiliation with Lashkar, including his training activities and attempts to procure equipment such as night vision goggles for the group.[88] Two years later, another wife met twice with officials at the US Embassy in Islamabad. She too spoke about her husband's involvement with Lashkar and frequent trips to India.[89] A diplomatic security officer who met with her sent a written report about the allegations to the FBI, CIA and DEA.[90] However, US officials asserted that she offered no information about specific attack planning and spoke only of her husband's general involvement with Lashkar.[91]

Shortly before this book went to press, the US Director of National Intelligence initiated a review of how Headley's case was handled. At the time of writing, it was unclear what action was taken in response to either the JTTF investigation or the US embassy report. Also unknown was the degree to which the DEA was aware of their charge's involvement in militant activities or what type of information he was providing to them while still an informant. Some US and Indian officials believe that by 2008