from infiltrating them by land and was exploring the viability of a maritime insertion. The men examined nautical charts and discussed various landing options. The frogman directed Headley to explore the position of naval vessels in order to avoid a gunfight before entering Indian waters, and in the days following this meeting Sajid taught him how to plot locations on a GPS. In a sign of the coordination in place, Major Iqbal was already aware of the planned maritime insertion by the time Headley returned to Lahore and met with him. Because this was an atypical mode of infiltration, Iqbal wanted to maximize the opportunity and use the ship to smuggle weapons into India as well. Further, while attack planning was accelerating, Iqbal also had other instructions. He directed Headley to explore the Bhabba Atomic Research Centre [BARC] in Mumbai during his next trip, and to pay particular attention to its staff colony as a potential target. India and Pakistan have a bilateral agreement not to attack one another's nuclear installations, and Iqbal's interest in the BARC as a potential target suggests he was among those in the ISI prepared to push the boundaries.[100]

After returning to Mumbai in April 2008 and conducting surveillance in the residential area surrounding the BARC, Headley took a series of boat rides around the harbor. The first two and the fourth did not amount to much, save for the fish he caught and gave to his landlady. But the third proved quite helpful and Headley plotted the coordinates for this landing site into the GPS he had been given.[101] Despite the expansion to include multiple attackers, Sajid and others remained intent on exfiltrating them from Mumbai after the operation. To this end, Headley surveyed the Chhatrapati Shivaji Terminus and a nearby bus station to assess their feasibility as an egress point. Back in Pakistan later that month Lakhvi was becoming convinced that he could 'see this thing happening.' But Headley did not perceive the same sense of urgency he saw before his last trip to India. Then in early June Sajid called him to another meeting. The attacks had been scheduled for September. The fidayeen would infiltrate by sea, but the plan remained for them to flee in the aftermath. Sajid continued to view the Chhatrapati Shivaji Terminus as a viable egress option and directed Headley to take note of the train timings at the terminus during his next trip.[102]

Headley received another call from Sajid in late June, telling him it was urgent that he return to Mumbai. A host of targets was now on the table: