distributing propaganda and detained Hafiz Saeed along with a handful of other high-ranking JuD officials.[6] By the end of January, the security services had rounded up close to 100 members of Lashkar and JuD, while putting over 100 more under surveillance. The government also announced it had assumed control over Muridke as well as other JuD infrastructure in Pakistan and shut down numerous relief camps, some of which were suspected of doubling as recruiting or training centers.[7] However, despite these initial steps, JuD was not banned under Pakistan's Anti-Terrorism Act and it remained a legal organization in Pakistan at the time of writing.

Pakistan had a history of executing mass detentions in the wake of an attack against India, only to release militants once pressure abated. Nor was this the first time the government had seized Lashkar's offices, closed down some of its camps and restricted its activities in the short-term in order to be seen to be doing something. The 2001–2002 experience, in which the group was banned and then allowed to reinvent itself as JuD illustrated the degree to which efforts made in response to US and Indian pressure were reversible. At the height of Pakistani action against Lashkar and the above-ground JuD, there was widespread suspicion that this latest crackdown would prove as cosmetic as those in the past. One Pakistani journalist told the author this would be just like the movie Groundhog Day, in which the lead character repeatedly awoke to the same day over and over again, to drive home the point that any crackdown would turn out just like 2001. This proved an accurate assessment. When exploring Pakistan's treatment of Lashkar it is important to remember the country is not monolithic. The civilian government in power at the federal level was more predisposed toward peace with India and action against the country's militants than the army or ISI, which sought to preserve Lashkar as an instrument for proxy war. Meanwhile, the two political parties in power at the federal level and in Punjab province were fierce adversaries, which hampered coordination between the two. Thus, it was possible for some actors to pursue action against Lashkar, while others sought to protect the group either for strategic or political interests.

Of the approximately 100 Lashkar members rounded up in December 2008 and January 2009, most were never charged and instead bled back out onto the streets over the next several months. Pakistan's Federal Investigative Agency [FIA] registered a case in early February 2009 against five Lashkar members who were arrested and in custody, including Lakhvi