who was identified as the mastermind of the plot; Mazhar Iqbal [a.k.a. Abu al-Qama] who was identified as one of the handlers; Abdul Wajid [a.k.a. Zarar Shah] who was identified as a facilitator and expert of computer networks; Hammad Amin Sadiq who was identified as a facilitator of funds and hideouts; and Shahid Jamil Riaz who was identified as a facilitator of funds as well as a crew member aboard the Al Husseini. An additional thirteen low-level functionaries not in custody were also named as proclaimed offenders.[8] It took almost a year to issue an indictment. One day ahead of the first anniversary of Mumbai, seven Lashkar members were indicted for their involvement in the attacks. The Islamabad Bureau of the BBC obtained a copy of the 10-page charge sheet filed on 25 November 2009. It listed the case as the State versus Hammad Amin Sadiq etc., whom it described along with Lakhvi and five others as 'active members of defunct proscribed organization Lashkar-e-Taiba.' The seven were accused of training, instructing and providing funds as well as hideouts for the ten gunmen.[9] All pleaded not guilty.[10]

This was the first time in the country's history that criminal charges were levied against the perpetrators of a terrorist attack on foreign soil, and was a significant step forward. However, it is notable that several of the architects of the attacks were absent from the indictment, as was Hafiz Saeed. Pakistani officials continued to claim they were serious about cracking down, but argued not enough evidence existed to put Saeed on trial for the Mumbai attacks.[11] India repeatedly challenged this assertion, insisting that Kasab's confession and Headley's testimony confirmed his involvement. Indian officials claimed to have shared this and other information with their Pakistani counterparts, but to no avail.[12] New Delhi also produced a list of additional suspects and requested that Pakistan extradite Majors Iqbal and Samir Ali.[13] In response the government of Pakistan announced in July 2010 that it was investigating both men as well as four additional militants identified by India as playing important parts in the Mumbai attacks.[14] The outcome of these investigations and of the trial against the seven indicted Lashkar members remained uncertain at the time of writing.

The authorities in Pakistan had put Hafiz Saeed under house arrest within weeks of the Mumbai attacks. They did so in response to intense US pressure, and immediately following a visit from Deputy Secretary of State
