John D. Negroponte who issued a stern warning that Pakistan must take action against Lashkar. However, placing Saeed under house arrest was a tactic that had been used in the past: in winter 2001 following the Parliament attack; in spring 2002 following the Lashkar attack on Indian security forces and their families in Kaluchak; and again in 2006 after the Mumbai train blasts. It was a temporary action, designed to show Pakistan was doing something as well as a means of lowering Saeed's profile, and thereby JuD's as well, in the short-term until pressure subsided. He was always released and allowed to resume addressing rallies, recruiting and fundraising. In this instance, his detention was extended twice after the initial orders expired. When pressed by the courts to provide grounds for these extended detentions, however, the government referred primarily to the UN designation of JuD as a terrorist organization. While the inclusion of JuD on the UN Al-Qaeda and Taliban Sanctions Committee list brought with it a travel ban as well as an assets freeze and arms embargo, it did not demand the arrest or detention of the organization's leaders. When Saeed mounted a legal challenge, a court ruled his detention was illegal and ordered him released.[15] Later, a Lahore court threw out an additional two anti-terrorism cases against Saeed, ruling that the prosecution had presented no evidence that JuD was involved in terrorism. Both of the cases had been registered under Pakistan's Anti-Terrorism Act and Saeed's defense argued, correctly, that he could not be charged under this law since Pakistan had not proscribed JuD.

JuD's headquarters at Jamiat al-Qadsia in Lahore also remained open for business. The author was repeatedly denied access in spring 2009, but two Pakistani colleagues who offered Friday prayers at the Jamia Masjid al-Qadsia, the mosque attached to JuD's headquarters, described what they saw upon entering the complex. At least five men armed with submachine guns and dressed in camouflage commando jackets were present, three between the entry gate and the courtyard, and another two on the roof. Two people were collecting money for Lashkar's jihad and urged all who were attending to contribute. The bookstore had posters advertising jihadi literature, and the offices remained open. Hafiz Saeed's son, Hafiz Talha Saeed, led the prayers and during his sermon preached that because Jews and Christians were united against Muslims, it was the responsibility of all Muslims to wage jihad against them. This jihad was compulsory and he urged Muslims to fight Jews and Christians wherever they were or, if they