could not physically fight, then to support the jihad in other ways. Sermons such as this one are not uncommon, and nor was the continued practice of fundraising for the jihad or sale of jihadi propaganda. The author and several interlocutors saw collection boxes for Lashkar, JuD and other banned organizations in various locales. Fundraising at other mosques and door-to-door drives continued as well, while Lashkar's jihadi propaganda continued to be sold at shops visited by the author and several colleagues. One told the author that the JuD-owned bookstore near his home in Lahore simply took down the Jamaat-ul-Dawa sign and put up one naming it the Islamic Library, while continuing to sell the same publications as in the past. These activities belied government claims that JuD publications had been banned along with the group's right to raise money. Yet even if authorities wanted to prosecute such activities, doing so would prove difficult for the same reason that holding Seed indefinitely was impossible: JuD was not a banned organization.

Technically, JuD was prohibited from collecting donations or maintaining accounts and funds in public banks. However, two days after JuD's accounts supposedly were closed, Wall Street Journal reporters discovered some remained open for deposits. According to one of the journalists who broke the story, a local stringer phoned JuD's offices in Lahore at the Wall Street Journal's behest and asked to donate money. He was told to contact a Lahore branch of another bank, where an account remained open in the name of Markaz Jamaat-ul-Dawa.[16] The bank details for the Lahore branch given to the Wall Street Journal match those on a flyer produced by the group soliciting money during the Muslim festival of Eid, which ended not long before the ban was instituted. The banner headline stated 'Don't forget mujahideen and refugees of Kashmir & Afghanistan during your Eid delights.' The appeal continued, 'The Lashker-e-Taiba mujahideen fighting against the tyrannical forces occupying the Islamic world, the heirs of more than 1500 martyrs and hapless refugees of Kashmir and Afghanistan are the most deserving of your alms, Zakat and other donations.' Notably, this appeal for funds on behalf of Lashkar's martyrs directed supporters to donate money into a JuD account.[17]

After this initial oversight the authorities did close those remaining public accounts listed under JuD's name according to Western diplomats
