monitoring the situation at the time.[18] They had less success seizing the group's existing financial assets, and there is little doubt the group knew an asset freeze was coming. A former official in the Punjab provincial government involved in executing the crackdown told the author that the authorities did not want to come down too hard for fear of creating a backlash. Instead, they sought to exploit Lashkar's history of avoiding violence against the state and took the JuD leadership into their confidence. The official said this extended to briefing senior leaders in advance about activities that would be taken against them. He recounted that they were told, 'Don't panic. We're not going to crack down too hard. We will tell you in advance what we will do.'[19] To be fair, it's questionable whether such a warning was even necessary. The public lead-up to the initial UN resolution gave the group plenty of time to move money out of its public accounts and stash that cash elsewhere. One Pakistani finance ministry official estimated that JuD transferred at least hundreds of thousands of dollars and possibly millions in the days leading up to the ban. He expressed skepticism that Pakistan would ever find those funds.[20]

Indian officials alleged that at least some of this money was transferred into the accounts of the Falah-e-Insaniat Foundation [FIF].[21] This was the new name for Idara Khidmat-e-Khalq [IKK], JuD's relief wing that played such a big role in rescue operations following the 2005 earthquake. In addition to using it as a repository for funds transferred to avoid the asset freeze, the group also raised money under the FIF banner.[22] Only two months after the restrictions were put in place, members marched through the streets of Lahore waving the JuD flag, soliciting donations and handing out receipts in the name of the FIF.[23] The group launched an FIF web site to promote its relief efforts. The site featured a prominent link urging people to 'Join Hands With FIF' by making a donation.[24] As it had done with the JuD name after Lashkar was banned in 2001, the group also began using the FIF label to keep some of its offices open for business.[25] By the time of the attacks, JuD was estimated to have approximately 2,000 offices in towns and villages throughout Pakistan.

However, FIF was more than just a JuD front. When heavy fighting broke out in the Swat Valley between the Pakistan army and pro-Taliban elements during the spring of 2009, it created an enormous refugee crisis inside Pakistan. The government was still pressuring the group to keep a
