low profile at this point and shut down its initial attempts to establish relief camps because JuD was operating openly under its own banner. The government had recently done the same in Balochistan, where the group had been providing earthquake relief using its own name.[26] In response, the group operated under the FIF banner. It established 24-hour kitchens, which fed over 50,000 refugees fleeing the fighting in Swat according to Hafiz Abdul Rauf, who previously headed IKK and was overseeing FIF relief operations there. A fleet of minibuses transported victims from the battle zone, and ambulances ferried the injured to a hospital. FIF also paid bus fares for refugees fleeing the area, as well as organizing lodging at madaris for those who could not make the trip.[27] Although FIF employees claimed no connection to JuD, the black-and-white Jamaat-ul-Dawa flag flying over the FIF's makeshift headquarters signaled the group's true identity.[28]

When monsoon rain caused massive flooding in Pakistan the following summer, FIF was again on the scene, though its officials were no longer reticent about belonging to JuD. The magnitude of the disaster dwarfed anything Pakistan had previously experienced, and left millions of people in urgent need of potable water, shelter and food. Experts predicted the ramifications in terms of economic hardship, loss of property and disease would be worse, and longer-lasting, than those that followed the 2005 earthquake. FIF claimed that it had deployed 2,000 volunteers and a fleet of ambulances within a week of the flooding.[29] It also opened refugee camps and provided foodstuffs to those in need in Northwest Pakistan and parts of Punjab.[30] The chaos and confusion made it difficult to determine how big a role the group was playing in comparison to other local and international aid agencies, though once again the army took the lead. While it has always been the primary institution responsible for disaster relief, the inability to reach many flood-effected areas without helicopter-transport meant the army played an even bigger role relative to other aid providers than in the past.

The main thrust of the post-Mumbai efforts against JuD took place in Punjab, where the provincial government sought to gain oversight over some of its activities. This oversight was nominal-based, meaning any organization with Jamaat-ul-Dawa in its name came under the provincial government's control. Money raised as well as spent by these organizations was supposed to flow through the government's coffers. The provincial
