government in Punjab appointed an administrator from the Education Department to oversee schools, one from the Department of Health to oversee hospitals and dispensaries and one from the Religious Affairs and Auqaf Department to oversee JuD mosques and madaris. Certain key staff were fired, but rank-and-file JuD members were allowed to remain in place. Those charities, schools, dispensaries, health clinics, mosques and madaris that operated under the JuD umbrella using their own names remained independent and were allowed to continue operating unmolested.[31]

The Punjab government also formally took control of Muridke, along with all of its assets, on 25 January 2009 and appointed an administrator to supervise all of the social, charitable and welfare projects at the facility.[32] Although a government administrator arranged the author's visit to Muridke in May 2009, no provincial officials were present. Abu Ehsan, the JuD administrator at Muridke, told the author they oversaw operations from Lahore and only made weekly visits. He said that since the ban the government was collecting money from the schools as well as the hospital, and was paying everyone's salary and funding all other provisions such as food and upkeep.[33] In June 2010 it emerged that the Punjab provincial government issued a grant of approximately 79 million rupees to the Markaz-e-Taiba compound at Muridke along with another 3 million rupees for JuD schools. Rana Sanaullah, the law minister in Punjab at the time, maintained the money allocated to Muridke was for the two schools and hospital located there.[34] Yet, even he had acknowledged publicly several months prior that JuD and Lashkar were simply different wings of the same group.[35] Further, while Sanaullah made a point of highlighting the restrictions in place when announcing the funds for Muridke, Hafiz Abdul Rehman Makki claimed these had been lifted and that 'now everything is running exactly the way it was running under the Jamaat's system.'[36] When the Punjab Home Department banned or re-banned many organizations in July 2010 in response to a series of terrorist attacks in the province, JuD once again escaped legal sanction.[37]

The decision to keep JuD schools and welfare organizations running, some with a modicum of oversight and many others without any, was driven by two factors according to local and Western officials: first, authorities wanted to avoid a revolt among the rank-and-file were they to be summarily dismissed; and second, these schools and welfare organizations
