additional action other than continuing to observe the militants and possibly relocating them to avoid further clashes.[40]

The degree to which Lashkar continued to operate openly was captured in spring 2010 when the government suspended access to the social networking website Facebook after some of its users (outside Pakistan) started a contest called 'Everybody Draw Muhammad Day.' Not long after a joke began making the rounds in Pakistan: What do Facebook and Lashkar-e-Taiba have in common? Both are technically banned in Pakistan, but still easy to join. Ironically, by this time the group was using Facebook to maintain an internet presence after the JuD web page was taken down following Mumbai in order to lower its profile. Pictures on its Facebook page captured the duality of Lashkar's continued Indo-centric and expanding global jihadi impulses. The image of the Taj Mahal Hotel in flames appeared with slogans that read 'free Kashmir, Pakistan's lifeline, from the enemy' and 'freedom of the Muslims of Gujarat, Hyderabad, Ahmedabad and the rest of India.' Alongside it were several images of Osama bin Laden, including one showing him riding away on horseback from the White House, which was engulfed in flames.[41] The group also launched a JuD Youtube page, which included videos of Lashkar militants and other outfits waging jihad across the globe. The page made no attempt to separate JuD and Lashkar, instead listing their names along with relevant links side-by-side.[42] Its Facebook and Youtube pages were part of a larger online presence for which the group produced many videos in the two years after the Mumbai attacks. While many of these focused on India, others included footage of attacks in Afghanistan, Iraq and elsewhere, though not necessarily by Lashkar militants.

Lashkar's social welfare infrastructure as well as part of its military apparatus used for jihad in Kashmir and terrorist attacks against India remained intact. But the jihad in Indian-administered Kashmir remained moribund and the group was under pressure by the ISI to keep a low profile in the wake of Mumbai.[43] Meanwhile the insurgency in Afghanistan was going from strength to strength. Soon the number of Lashkar members fighting there was expanding and collaboration with other outfits in the Tribal Areas increasing to an even greater degree than pre-Mumbai. Thus, the trends that contributed to the Mumbai attacks—a stagnating jihad in Kashmir, a surging one in Afghanistan and the effect of increased
