Indian Mujahideen were being reengaged to execute a fresh round of terrorist attacks.[66] Circumstantial evidence supports this. According to another two arrested Indian operatives, their handlers in Pakistan were trying to engineer serial bomb attacks in Delhi, Mumbai and Bangalore. They said that operatives were being instructed to include foreigners in their target sets when plotting attacks in India.[67]

The Pune attack and the growing number of operations in Afghanistan against Indian interests shared a common characteristic: both were indicative of a trend toward hybridized target selection. This suggested that Lashkar was more inclined than it had been in the past to include US and allied interests in its target set, a proposition reinforced by the fact that in late 2008 Lashkar began plotting a terrorist attack in Denmark in concert with David Headley, the operative responsible for surveillance in Mumbai. There is little doubt that this began as a Lashkar-led enterprise or that the group was prepared to use a highly valuable operative for an out-of-area operation. As the Danish plot reveals, however, the leadership remained susceptible to ISI pressure and preoccupied with India. Yet this did not stop Headley from moving forward independently from Lashkar after his handler postponed the operation. Thanks to the interconnectedness of jihadi networks in Pakistan by this point, he was able to find operational support elsewhere. Indeed, as the following will demonstrate, Lashkar remained a gateway to al-Qaeda, even if it did not always want to be. It also remained an opportunistic outfit, unprepared to let go of a valuable transnational operative despite his freelancing or to shut the door on the Danish plot completely.

Initial discussions regarding a possible attack in Denmark began in October 2008. With the assault on Mumbai looming, David Headley received a visit from his Lashkar and ISI handlers, Sajid Mir and Major Iqbal. Headley had always met each one separately and this was the first time all three were together. They discussed launching an attack against Morgenavisen Jyllands-Posten, the Danish newspaper responsible for printing cartoons in 2005 that depicted the Prophet Mohammad. Sajid codenamed it Northern Project, overruling Headley's suggested 'Mickey Mouse Project [MPP].'[68] Major Iqbal's presence at a meeting in which Lashkar operatives discussed plans for a terrorist attack in a Western country is a significant event. It is unclear whether he approved of the plot
