or if his attendance was a means of keeping tabs on possible future operations in order to rein in the group if necessary. Even if it was the latter, that such a discussion could take place is a testament to the relationship between Lashkar's operatives and their ISI handlers. Moreover, the fact that planning for the attack was allowed to progress is indicative of the latitude some of Lashkar's handlers were prepared to provide the group.

Not long after this visit from Mir and Iqbal, Headley met separately with Abdur Rehman Syed. The latter had moved away completely from Lashkar by this time and indicated that if Lashkar did not go through with the attack then he knew someone else who would.[69] Although Syed did not reveal this person's identity at the time, he did indicate the person was close to al-Qaeda and asked if Headley would be interested in working with them. The person in question was Ilyas Kashmiri, the former HuJI commander who moved his infrastructure to North Waziristan in 2007 and led the 313 Brigade. Syed had floated his own outfit, Jund-al-Fida, which operated under Kashmiri's command.[70] Headley accepted Syed's invitation, but also continued moving forward with Sajid on preparations for the Northern Project. The two met again in early November, at which point Sajid gave Headley a memory stick containing information about Denmark as well as pictures of the editor and cartoonist at Morgenavisen Jyllands-Posten. Sajid instructed him to conduct surveillance on the newspaper's offices in Copenhagen and Aarhus, and provided 3,000 euros to cover his travel and expenses.[71] Headley claims to have met with Sajid again in December before making his first reconnaissance trip, at which time the latter directed him to survey a synagogue in Denmark in addition to the newspaper's offices.[72]

Headley returned briefly to the US in December and once against turned to his friend Tahawwur Hussain Rana about using First World Immigration as a cover. He alleges that Rana agreed, and thereafter Headley presented himself as a First World representative interested in placing advertisements in the Jyllands-Posten's newspaper as a means to gain entry to its offices. He used this ruse twice during his first trip to Denmark: first in Copenhagen where he accessed the newspaper's offices and took extensive video surveillance of the surrounding areas, and then several days later to obtain access to the Jyllands-Posten office in Aarhus. As he had in Copenhagen, Headley surveyed the surrounding area as well. Headley then