transnational networks which were used for fundraising and logistics to support its non-violent activism in Pakistan, military operations in Kashmir and terrorism in India. Its domestic infrastructure was also mobilized to support Lashkar's jihad in Indian-administered Kashmir, where its growing reputation simultaneously drew recruits from beyond the Ahl-e-Hadith faith to the group. Thus, its missionary and military activities became self-reinforcing. Meanwhile, because Lashkar's ideological priorities vis-à-vis liberating Indian-administered aligned with state objectives, the group's pan-Islamist identity and its role as a Pakistani proxy were aligned.

Debates took place within Lashkar after 9/11, as they did in other jihadi organizations, about whether to alter its priorities or relationship with the state. Ultimately the group agreed to continue submitting to state oversight. The leadership's readiness to do so stemmed from a committment to the Kashmir jihad as well as a desire to protect the organization's position and robust infrastructure in Pakistan. In exchange for adhering to the Musharraf regime's agenda, Lashkar was given greater freedom of maneuvre than any other outfit in the country. JuD remained legal, enabling the group to keep its supply lines open. Its local and international fundraising surged, while recruitment remained steady. With its safe haven in Pakistan secure, the group also broadened its already robust transnational networks while maintaining a healthy level of militant activity in Indian-administered Kashmir. The Musharraf regime periodically scaled back militant activities there during the first years after 9/11, but these were periodic interuptions. Lashkar remained the most prolific Pakistani outfit fighting on the Kashmir front, and also began devoting greater attention to executing and supporting terrorist attacks against India. The group had been involved in terrorist violence within India since the early 1990s, where communal grievances fueled the growth of a nascent jihadi movement. A greater number of Indian Muslims were drawn to jihadism after the Gujarat riots in 2002, and Lashkar's support augmented the lethality of this indigenous movement.

Although it prioritized the fight against India, Lashkar began playing its own double game after 9/11, using its infrastructure in Pakistan and transnational networks to contribute to the global jihad against America and its allies. This included the provision of training and logistical support to established outfits as well as aspiring Western jihadis, for whom the group sometimes facilitated access to al-Qaeda. Lashkar operatives were directly involved in an attempted terrorist attack against Australia and are suspected
