paramilitaries and two civilians. Though a civilian airport, Lashkar claimed it was being used by the military and was thus a legitimate target. This attack also failed to end the ceasefire.

Although India and Pakistan continued to move forward, peace did not materialize. There was hope Musharraf and Vajpayee might settle on an agreement when they met at the Agra Summit in July 2001, but their two countries were unable to agree even on the wording for a joint communiqué. The process devolved further after 9/11 and hopes for peace broke down entirely after militants from JeM attacked the Indian Parliament in New Delhi in December 2001. Sporadic arrests aside, the Musharraf regime never seriously clamped down on the jihadi groups in Pakistan throughout the entirety of this peace effort. Meanwhile, after a three-year decline in militant fatalities from 1996–1999, the numbers steadily climbed from 1999 through 2002.[93] The majority of these remained indigenous fighters, which speaks to the fact that root grievances against India remained, with foreigners constituting approximately 30 per cent of those killed.[94] Using spectacularly violent attacks Lashkar and its fellow Pakistani jihadis had helped to spur another cycle of violence, which ultimately claimed mostly local casualties as a result.

The Red Fort and Srinagar airport attacks, though failing to halt the peace process, paid dividends at home. They not only boosted morale, but also Lashkar's recruitment and fundraising capabilities in Pakistan.[95] The Red Fort, in particular, had symbolic value. Moghul emperors had built and inhabited it. Thus, the attack was a symbolic re-conquest of the Hindu-occupied seat of the Moghul Empire. The militants specifically targeted an interrogation center the Indian army had created there; a site at which many captured mujahideen had died.[96] When interviewed by Pakistani journalist Zahid Hussain a month after the attack, Hafiz Saeed declared 'The action indicates that we have extended the jihad to India.'[97] In reality, Lashkar began exporting its jihad into India during the early 1990s; a time when it began building up its operations within Pakistan and its transnational networks abroad as well.
