located in the city of Karachi. The former followed the same curriculum as Medina University in Saudi Arabia and the latter educated approximately 500 students, many of whom came from South East Asia.[31] Military training was and remains separate from the group's schools and madaris. A student graduating from an MDI school or madrasa who wished to join the Kashmir jihad still needed to enter Lashkar's training program. Lashkar's four major training centers were the Muaskar-e-Taiba, Muaskar-e-Aqsa, Muaskar-e-Umm al-Qurra and Muaskar-e-Abdullah bin Masood. To process and house trainees, it opened the Bait-ul-Mujahideen [House of the Holy Warriors] in Pakistan-administered Kashmir.[32] In addition, Lashkar operated a host of smaller training centers elsewhere in Pakistan. The army and ISI greatly augmented Lashkar's training capacity, but its training program has changed little, with one exception: from 1998 Lashkar included additional religious training. Until that time its basic training regimen consisted of the Daura-e-Aama [General Session], which was essentially a three-week introductory course given to everyone and the Daura-e-Khasa [Special Session] consisting of three months of military training offered to select individuals. Additional specialized military courses were offered on an even more selective basis.

Training was intended to do more than prepare people to fight. Because Lashkar aimed to spread the Ahl-e-Hadith faith in Pakistan rather than merely to create a cadre of battle-ready militants, training was also used as a means to recruit and indoctrinate people in its interpretation of Islam. The Daura-e-Aama consisted primarily of prayer and physical training, with some introductory weapons drills. The main purpose was to teach the principles of its interpretation of the Ahl-e-Hadith school of thought, to convert those who belonged to other sects and motivate trainees to become involved in Lashkar's various activities.[33] Leaders, including Hafiz Saeed and Zaki-ur Rehman Lakhvi, made speeches to the recruits about the obligation to wage or otherwise support jihad and the need to prepare for it.[34]

The group's literature illustrates its organizational reach and the systematized nature of its training regimen during the 1990s. Regular classes for the Daura-e-Aama began every Monday and recruits were required to arrive at the training center on the previous Sunday. All trainees were instructed to bring a letter of authorization issued by their zonal or