were directed to review graduated participants' performance at weekly or fortnightly meetings and to provide them a schedule of activities.[39]

Based on the testimony of captured operatives, it appears the Daura-e-Suffa soon became the first level of training followed by the Daura-e-Aama. It also seems that over time the focus became imbuing religious principals, including the obligatory nature of jihad, with less attention paid in some cases to sending trainees out to preach.[40] Lashkar offered the Daure-e-Aama and the Daura-e-Suffa to anyone regardless of sect and used them as an opportunity to convert people to the Ahl-e-Hadith faith. The group does not appear to have conducted background checks for either of these two training programs and it was possible to give a fake name if one wanted to. According to one former member and a researcher who tracked Lashkar's activities during the 1990s, more thorough vetting was done for those continuing on to the Daura-e-Khasa. Anyone actually sent into Indian-administered Kashmir received additional scrutiny.[41] Not everyone who completed the Daure-e-Aama and the Daura-e-Suffa advanced to the Daura-e-Khasa for military training. Some simply left and Lashkar assigned most who wished to join the organization to work for MDI (a practice continued with its successor, JuD) in various dawa capacities including raising funds, creating and disseminating propaganda or providing social services. Some recruits also chose this path, which the organization accepted. Both were considered essential to Lashkar's mission.[42]

Those who wished to receive serious military instruction needed a recommendation from a senior functionary and typically did not progress directly from the previous stage of training. Instead they often performed other supervised tasks that entailed proselytizing or performing khidmat [service] either at one of the group's offices or elsewhere. Often trainees were given time to return home to visit their families in between khidmat and the Daura-e-Khasa, during which time they might also be mentored by local Lashkar functionaries.[43] Lashkar's extensive organizational reach enabled it to monitor these trainees to ensure they comported themselves appropriately. Those selected to attend the Daura-e-Khasa were instructed to bring their Daura-e-Suffa card, a letter of recommendation and a deposit of 500 rupees, though managers were requested to cooperate with those who could not afford to pay. Numerous Pakistani interlocutors observed that Lashkar was considered stricter than other jihadi groups with regard to