Lashkar's Daura-e-Ribat. This program included training on how to collect intelligence, handle agents, engage in sabotage and surveillance, conduct briefings as well as debriefings, and communicate in code. It also featured lectures about India, its security agencies including the Research and Analysis Wing [RAW] and how to evade security personnel.[49] Finally, not all of those who went through these myriad training activities actually saw combat. Some were given management roles in the organization instead.

The group has claimed that 'the mujahideen trained by the Lashkar-e-Taiba are fighting the infidels everywhere.'[50] Most of the foreigners Lashkar trained returned to their respective countries to wage jihad; indeed the organization claims to have trained thousands of recruits from all over the world who went on to play leading combat roles in Afghanistan, Bosnia-Herzegovina, Chechnya, Kosovo, the southern Philippines, Kashmir and 'other areas where Muslims are fighting for freedom.'[51] As a group motivated by the desire to protect fellow members of the umma and one interested in developing transnational ties to other jihadi outfits, this readiness to train others is not surprising. According to one Pakistan-based Western diplomat who has tracked Lashkar's activities since the 1990s, it developed a reputation for being willing to train militants from other outfits.[52] However, its braggadocio aside, most of those who passed through Lashkar's camps came from Pakistan and fought in Indian-administered Kashmir.

Lashkar often exaggerated its exploits for propaganda purposes. Estranged from the other Ahl-e-Hadith organizations, and hence their networks, it had to maintain a healthy focus on propaganda in order to recruit and raise funds. In its early years, before the increase in state support, the group talked up its achievements prematurely and built a propaganda operation that was disproportionately large compared to its actual, on the ground, strength at the time. As one observer of the group's activities noted, 'people thought they were strong because they were so visible, but they were so visible because they had to build a network from nothing.' Image and presence were important, leading Lashkar to operate offices in areas where they had little hope of finding recruits.[53] It also produced an array of written material, the content of which was often exaggerated, a practice that continued even after the group's capacity increased. One former member admitted that, 'We used to make fun of the
