claims about the number of Indian soldiers killed. If you calculate the number Lashkar claimed to have killed from 1990 the Indian army should be gone by 2000.'[54] In addition to a penchant for hyperbole, the group sometimes claimed credit for other groups' operations as well.[55]

State support enabled many jihadi outfits to develop a powerful propaganda machinery that reflected aspects of the modern media. This 'jihadi journalism' employed the same printing systems, approaches to layout, and marketing strategies as normal newspapers in Pakistan. Their sales and circulation were comparable to competing mainstream publications, and low prices meant they were easily affordable.[56] The MDI Department of Media and Propagation and its Dar-ul-Andalus Department of Publishing combined to print the widest range of propaganda offerings of any jihadi group in Pakistan, the flagship of which was a monthly magazine, Al-Dawa, which Lashkar claimed enjoyed a circulation of 100,000 by the end of the 1990s.[57] This was the highest circulation among jihadi monthlies according to Amir Rana, who conducted an assessment of jihadi propaganda in Pakistan. The group's weekly Ghazwa Times, also in Urdu and later in Sindhi as well, gave the latest news about Lashkar's jihad as well as national affairs and had the second highest circulation among weeklies.[58] Both Ghazwa Times and Al-Dawa magazine conveyed logistical information as well, such as schedule changes for training courses.[59] The group published a magazine for students called Zarb-e-Taiba and one for women called Taibat, both also in Urdu. The media department also published Al-Ribat in Arabic and Voice of Islam in English. By 2001, the Dar-ul-Andalus Department of Publishing was printing over one hundred booklets a year in Urdu, English, Arabic and Persian.[60]

The group also had a robust internet presence, maintaining websites in Urdu, Arabic and English. Its web presence kept pace with the times and its sites became more interactive and sophisticated as the 1990s drew to a close. By that time it had become the only jihadi group in Pakistan with a web-based radio station, Radio al-Jihad, which broadcast in Urdu, English, Arabic and Sindhi.[61] This boosted the group's profile within Pakistan and abroad. At home, people were able to tune in for live coverage of sermons given by Lashkar's leadership. By broadcasting via the internet in English, the group was able to reach members of the diaspora living abroad. In addition, the group also ran a 'News & Views' series in which it reported
