on events throughout the Muslim world and offered commentary pieces. In its 'Europe Under Muslim Rule' series, Lashkar offered its own interpretation of the history of Muslim conquest throughout Europe to support its irredentist ambitions.[62] Notably, the name of its publishing department, Dar-ul-Andalus, is a reference to the former Muslim empire of Al Andalus in today's Spain.

Propaganda naturally also covered all manner of jihadi activities in Kashmir as well as glorifying the participation of its mujahideen in sundry conflicts around the world. The group's website and several of its publications ran a 'Mujahideen Activities' series in which it reported on its fighters' exploits. The language used was often over-the-top, with headlines such as '30 Bodies Sent to Delhi,' and '12 [Indians] Sent Packing to Hell.' The body of the text was no less exaggerated. Lashkar's mujahideen were imbued with almost superhuman powers and, of course, a thirst for martyrdom.[63] Al-Dawa magazine also featured a special section with testaments and life stories of martyrs intended to inveigle other young men to follow in their footsteps. These testaments generally emphasized the redemptive value of joining Lashkar and becoming a martyr.[64]

The Department of Media and Propagation managed the group's public events as well as liaising with the media. In addition to the routine issuing of press releases, this department arranged programs and conferences at Murdike as well as at local offices. It also set up camps or stalls in different parts of the country to provide a venue for the general public to pose questions, gather information about Lashkar's activities, and hear its position on different issues. Some of these 'camps' offered 'civil defense training,' which combined lectures on the importance of jihad with the opportunity to fire off a few rounds from a Kalashnikov. The hope was to inspire young men to join the cause.[65] According to the group's Al-Dawa magazine, its media liaison team would arrange for the Pakistan press to attend. This included setting up press briefings and separate enclosures for the press corps.[66] In addition to inspiring recruits and gaining public notoriety, these events also were used to collect funds.

MDI held a number of Ijtemas, or congregations, of varying size each year. Many of these were small, local affairs, but its annual Ijtemas held at Muridke were reported to have drawn between 500,000 and 1 million people by the late 1990s.[67] In addition to facilitating social networking,