fighter's martyrdom. Moreover the MDI website listed its address, phone number and bank details so that donors could deposit money directly.[99] In addition to collecting donations, the group collected taxes. MDI had, and JuD maintained, a Farmers' and Workers' Wing. Maqbul Ahmed initially ran this wing before Haji Muhammad Ashraf took over. Ashraf was one of four JuD leaders whose assets the US Treasury Department targeted in 2008, and he is the one who really developed the network. The Farmers and Labor Wing collected Ushr—an Islamic land tax that obligates farmers to donate 10 per cent of their harvest or income to charity for the provision of social services—from farmers in Pakistan.[100] Lashkar's leaders assert that, in the absence of a Caliph, it has the right to collect this tax.[101] According to one former member, people associated with the group who belonged to the business community also sometimes added an additional 5–10 rupees 'for the jihad' to the bill when selling various goods.[102]

Going beyond the gun to offer social services also won the group more than hearts and minds. It made Lashkar money. Al-Dawa Schools charged fees and although the group subsidized some students, overall it came out ahead. The administrator at Muridke claimed it never turned away students who were too poor to pay, and instead charged more from richer families and less from poorer ones.[103] Lashkar also charged a nominal fee for training, but could afford to waive that as well for those who could not afford it. Nor did it give away its propaganda for free. In one year alone, the Darul-Andalus Publishing Department reportedly collected 80 lakhs [equivalent to 8 million rupees or approximately $150,000 in the late 1990s] from the sale of its jihadi publications.[104] The group invested some of the money it raised in legitimate enterprises, including factories and other businesses.[105] Fundraising for militant activities can be a volatile business, and these investments created another stream of reliable income. In making these investments Lashkar was increasing its territorialized infrastructure within Pakistan, but also making itself more vulnerable to state pressure since it now had assets that could be threatened. However, the group's footprint was by no means entirely Pakistan-centric.

In February 2000, Hafiz Saeed hinted that Lashkar had a presence in the Indian heartland. He explained that the Kargil incursion had been the first component of a new Lashkar campaign and the introduction of fidayeen attacks in Indian-administered Kashmir the second. Saeed promised that
